

HARVARD COLLEGE LIBRARY

A HISTORY OF EGYPT

VOL. VI.

THE MIDDLE AGES

BIND
A

HISTORY OF EGYPT,

IN THE MIDDLE AGES

BY

STANLEY LANE-POOLE,<sup>M.A., LITT.D.</sup>
PROFESSOR OF ARABIC AT TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN

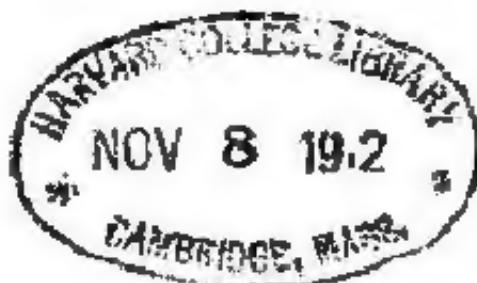

WITH A MAP AND 101 ILLUSTRATIONS

METHUEN & CO.
36 ESSEX STREET W.C.
LONDON
1901

Eg 278.94.6

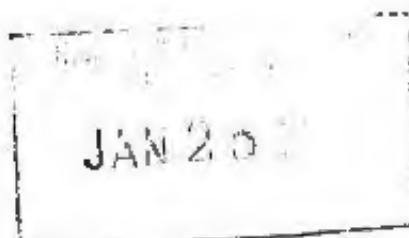

Eg 278.94.6

C

LONDON:

PRINTED BY GILBERT AND RIVINGTON, LTD.
ST. JOHN'S HOUSE, CLERKENWELL, E.C.

PREFACE

In this volume the History of Egypt in the Middle Ages, from its conquest by the Saracens in 640 to its annexation by the Ottoman Turks in 1517, is for the first time related in a continuous narrative apart from the general history of the Mohammadan caliphate. In compressing the events of nearly nine centuries into a single volume, many interesting subjects are of necessity treated very briefly, but the list of authorities at the head of each chapter will enable the student to obtain fuller details, especially if he is acquainted with Arabic.

Besides the works thus cited, I am particularly indebted to M. Max van Berchem, not only for permission to reproduce his photographs of inscriptions, but for his invaluable assistance in preparing the lists of inscriptions which precede each chapter, for which he kindly sent me the proof-sheets of the forthcoming volume of his Mémoires pour un Corpus Inscriptionum Arabicarum, and also notes of the Mamlük inscriptions he had collected in Syria. I have also to thank my colleagues Professor R. H. Charles and Professor J. B. Bury for their help in reference to the Ethiopic and Byzantine sources for the history of the Arab conquest; and M. P. Casanova and M. Herz Bey for the use of some of the illustrations.

S. L.-P.

TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN,
December 1st/A, 1900

Digitized by

Digitized by Google

Original from HARVARD UNIVERSITY

CONTENTS

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. THE ARAB CONQUEST, 639-641 . . . . .	1
II. A PROVINCE OF THE CALIPHATE, 641-868. . . . .	14
Tables of Governors and Chief Ministers	45
III. TÜLÜN AND IKHSHID, 868-969 . . . . .	59
IV. THE SHI'A REVOLUTION, 969 . . . . .	92
Table of Alleged Descent of Fātimid Caliphs.	116
V. THE FĀTIMID CALIPHS, 969-1094 . . . . .	117
VI. THE ATTACK FROM THE EAST, 969-1171 . . . . .	158
VII. SALADIN, 1169-1193 . . . . .	190
VIII. SALADIN'S SUCCESSORS (THE AYYŪBIDS), 1193-1250 .	212
Table of the Ayyūbid Dynasties . . . . .	212
IX. THE FIRST MAMLUKS, 1250-1279 . . . . .	242
X. THE HOUSE OF KALĀ'ŪN, 1279-1382 . . . . .	276
XI. THE CIRCASSIAN MAMLUKS, 1382-1517 . . . . .	323
INDEX . . . . .	359

•

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

FIG.		PAGE
1.	Mosque of 'Amr at Fustat	16
2.	Glass weight of Osma b. Zeyd [A.D. 720]	25
3.	Glass stamp of 'Obeydallah b. el-Habibah, dated 729	27
4.	Glass weight of el-Kâsim b. 'Obeydallah, 730	29
5.	Glass weight of 'Abel-el-Mehk b. Yezid, 750	29
6.	Glass weight of Yezid b. Hâtim, 761	32
7.	Glass weight of Mohammad b. Sa'Id, 769	33
8.	Glass weight of el-Fadl b. Salih, 785	34
9.	Dinâr (gold coin) of caliph el-Ma'mûn, struck at Misr (Fustat), 814	37
10.	Glass weight of Ashrâs, 834 ff.	38
11.	Section of Nilometer on island of Râdi, 9th century	62
12.	Mosque of Ahmad ibn Tûlûn at Cairo, 877-79	64
13.	Founder's inscription in mosque of Ibn-Tûlûn, 879	67
14.	Dinâr of Ahmad ibn Tûlûn, Misr, 881	68
15.	Title-deed (on wood) to a shop, 882	70
16.	Dinâr of Hârûn b. Khumâraweyh, Misr, 904	76
17.	Dinâr of Mohammad el-Ikhshid, Palestine, 943	84
18.	Dîhem of Abû-l-Kâsim b. el-Ikhshid, Damascus, 949	86
19.	Dinâr of Abû-l-Kâsim b. el-Ikhshid, Misr, 950	86
20.	Dinâr of el-Mo'izz, Misr, 969	101
21.	½-Dinâr of el-Mo'izz, Palestine, 974	106
22.	Door of el-Azhar mosque, 972	110
23.	Dinâr of el-'Azîz, Misr, 976	119
24.	½-Dinâr of el-Uâkûn, Sicily, 1004	124
25.	Dinâr of el-Hâkim, Misr, 1015	127
26.	Glass weight of el-Hâkim, 1012	129
27.	Mosque of el-Hâkim, 991-1003	130
28.	Dinâr of az-Zâhir, Misr, 1030	135
29.	Glass weight of el-Mustansîr	137
30.	Dinâr of el-Mustansîr, Misr, 1047	138
31.	Inscription of Bedr el-G'emâll in mosque of Ibn-Tûlûn, 1077	150
32.	Gate of Zawîla, Cairo, 1091	153
33.	Gate of Victory (Râb-en-Nâṣr), Cairo, 1087	155
34.	Dinâr of el-Musta'îl, Tripolis, 1101	162

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

FIG.		PAGE
35.	Glass weight of el-Amir	163
36.	Dinars of el-Amir, Küz, 1123 or 1125	166
37.	Dinār of "the exalted Imām," Cairo, 1131	167
38.	Glass weight of ez-Zāfir	171
39.	Dinār of ez-Zāfir, Misr, 1149	172
40.	Glass weight of el-'Āqid	175
41.	Dinār of el-'Āqid, Cairo, 1168	183
42.	Glass weight of caliph al-Mustadfi, issued by Saladin, 1171	192
43.	Dinar of Nūr-ed-dīn, issued by Saladin, Cairo, 1173	196
44.	Dinār of Saladin, Cairo, 1179	200
45.	Citadel of Cairo (drawn in 1798)	201
46.	Saladin's inscription on the Gate of Steps in the Citadel of Cairo, 1183	203
47.	Gate of Steps in Citadel of Cairo, 1183	205
48.	Darhem (silver coin) of Saladin, Aleppo, 1186	207
49.	Saladin's inscr plow at church of St. Anne, Jerusalem, 1192	208
50.	Dinār of el-'Āqid, Alexandria, 1199	215
51.	Carved border of a sheykh's tomb, 1216	219
52.	Eagle on Citadel of Cairo, probably early 13th century	223
53.	Dinār of el-Kābul, Alexandria, 1225	229
54.	Dinār of ez-Sāliḥ Ayyūb, Cairo, 1239	230
55.	Inscription on tomb of ez-Sāliḥ Ayyūb, 1252	231
56.	Dinār of queen Shāger-ed-durr, Cairo, 1250	255
57.	Dinār of Aybek, Alexandria, 1256	256
58.	Dinār of Beybars, Alexandria, 1261	263
59.	Lion of Beybars on boss of mosque door, 1268	264
60.	Tomb-mosque of Kalā'ūn, 1284	283
61.	Dinār of Khalil, Cairo, date effaced	285
62.	Dinār of Ketbughā, Cairo, 1294-95	290
63.	Inscription on madrasa (college) of en-Nāṣir at Cairo, 1299	293
64.	Arms of a polo-master	302
65.	Bowl of an emir of en-Nāṣir in the British Museum	303
66.	Inscription in medreṣa of princess Tawār el-Ijāzīya, at Cairo, 1360	307
67.	Tower in Citad. of Cairo	309
68.	Kursi of en-Nāṣir, 14th century in the Cairo Museum	311
69.	Mosque of Sengar and Salīb, 1323	313
70.	Arms of emir el-Māridāni, 14th century, from a glass lamp	314
71.	Hall of Columns built by en-Nāṣir in Citadel of Cairo, 1313	315
72.	Arms of emir Takuzdemir, from a lamp in the British Museum, 14th century	316
73.	Dinār of en-Nāṣir, Cairo, 1340	317
74.	Dinar of sultan Hasan, Cairo, 1349	318
75.	Palace of emir Yeshbek at Cairo, 1476, adjoining mosque of sultan Hasan	319
76.	Memorial inscription in tomb of sultan Hasan, 1384	320
77.	Mosque of sultan Hasan, 1362, from the Citadel	321
78.	Arms of an emir inlaid in ivory and coloured woods	329

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

xi

FIG.		PAGE
79.	Dinar of Barkuk, Aleppo, 1383.	330
80.	Pulpit (minbar) in tomb-mosque of Barkuk outside Cairo, 1401-11	331
81.	Enamelled glass lamp of Barkuk in Arab Museum at Cairo	333
82.	Dinar of Farag, Cairo, 1407	334
83.	Kufic inscription of el-Mu'ayyad	335
84.	Dinar of el-Mu'ayyad, Alexandria, 1415	336
85.	Dinar of Bars-Bey, Alexandria, 1423	340
86.	Dinar of Kait-Bey, 1468-96	342
87.	Tomb-mosque of Kait Bey, 1474	343
88.	Door of mosque of Kait-Bey, 1474	345
89.	Wek'a or caravanserai of Kait-Bey, 1477, near Arba	346
90.	Arms of Kait-Bey	347
91.	Arms of Kait Bey from a lamp	348
92.	Arms of emir Fazek on his mosque, 1405	349
93.	Inscription of Tuman-Bey I in Citadel of Cairo, 1500.	350
94.	Sixteenth century house at Rosetta	351
95.	Dinar of el-Ghuri, Cairo, 1508	352
96.	Arms of commandant Akchuk, c. 1516	353
97.	Bab-el-Azali, Gate of the Citadel of Cairo, 18th century	354
98.	Altar of sultan Suleymân of Turkey, 1520	355
99.	Vigimlik of 'Ali Bey, Mist, 1769	356
100.	The Citadel of Cairo in 1839	356
	Plan of Cairo and suburbs in the 12th century	302
	Map of Egypt and adjacent countries	1

* * * The coins and glass weights are reproduced from plaster casts of the originals in the British Museum; the inscriptions are from M. Max von Berchem's Corpus Inscriptionum Arabicarum (Mem. de la Miss. archéol. française au Caire xix.), where French translations are given), except fig. 49, which is from his Inscriptions graves de Syrie (Mem. de l'Institut Egyptien, 1897); figs. 47 and 67 are from M. Paul Casanova's Hist. de la Citadelle du Caire (Mém. de la Miss. archéol. française au Caire, vi.); the coins of arms are from Rogers Bey's article in the Bull. de l'Inst. Egypt., 1880, except fig. 92, which is from H. E. Artin Pasha's article on Trois différentes armes des Kait Bey (ibid.); fig. 52 is from an article by Mr. H. C. Kay in the Journal of the R. Asiatic Society, N.S., xiv (1882); figs. 11, 33, 45, and 71 are from the plates of the Description de l'Egypte; the rest are from photographs, of which figs. 69, 75, 89 and 94 were kindly supplied by Herz Bey, chief architect of the Commission for the Preservation of Arab Monuments in Egypt.

PRINCIPAL AUTHORITIES

PART I

- 695 John, Bishop of Nikiu : Chronique, ed. & tr. H. Zetterberg (Notices et Extraits, xxv), Paris, 1883.
- 871 Ibn 'Abd-al-Hakam : Futūh Misr (Paris codex 655; ep. Zeitschr. für Kunde d. Morgenl. iii., 1840)
- 889 Ibn Kutayha : ed. F. Wüstenfeld, Göttingen, 1850.
- 892 El-Bilichuti : Jacev expugnacionis regnum, ed. M. J. de Goeje, Lugd. Bat., 1866.
- 903 Et Tūnis Annals, ed. de Goeje et alii, 13 vols., Lugd. Bat. 1879-96.
- 956 El-Mas'ūdī. Les Prairies d'or, Arab. et Fr., ed. Morlier de Meynard et Pavet de Courteille, 9 vols., Paris, 1861-1873.
- 977 'Arib b. Sa'd el-Kurkubī : Tibarī continuatus, ed. M. J. de Goeje, Lugd. Bat., 1897.
- 1145 William of Tyre : Historia rerum in partibus transmarinis gestarum (Rac. Hist. des Croisades), Paris, 1844.
- 1148 Usama ibn Munkidh. Kitāb al-I'ādah: Vie d'Usama, ed. & tr. H. Derenbourg, 3 vols., Paris, 1836-93.
- 1208 Abbé Sallīb : Churches and Monasteries of Egypt, Arab. and Engl., ed. B. T. A. Evertis, Aneid. Oxoniens., 1895.
- 1231 'Abd-el-Latīf : Historie d'Egypti Compendium, Arab. et Lat., ed. J. White, Oxon., 1800; Relation de l'Egypte, tr. S. de Sacy, Paris, 1810.
- 1233 Ibn-el-Athīr: Chronicon (el-Kāmu), ed. C. J. Tornberg, 14 vols., Lugd. Bat., 1867-74.
- 1234 Bahkād-dīn ibn Shāfi'dād : Vita Saladii, Arab. et Lat., ed. Schulens, Lugd. Bat., 1732; and in Rac. Hist. des Croisades, iii., 1884.
- 1267 Abū-Shāmā : A'zāt ar-Rawdatayn 2 vols., Cairo, 1870-1871.
- 1275 El-Mekīn : Historia Saracenos, Arab. et Lat., ed. T. Erpenius, Lugd. Bat., 1625.
- 1282 Ibn-Khalikān : Wejyāt al-'A'yān, ed. F. Wüstenfeld, Göttingen, 1835-50; Biographical Dictionary, tr. M. de Slane, 4 vols., Paris, 1843-71.
- 1307 Joinville : Mémoires, ed. M. Francisque Michel, Paris, 1881.
- 1331 Abū-l-Fidā : Annales Musulmānes, Arab. et Lat., ed. Reiske et Adler, Hofnissae, 1788-93.

DIRE
 1377 Ibn-Batūta : Voyages, Arab. et Fr., ed. C. Debrémery et Sanguineti, 4 vols., Paris, 1873-9.
 1406 Ibn-Khaldūn : Kitāb al-İbar, 7 vols., Būlāk, 1867-8.
 1413 El-Kalkashandī : Die Geographie und Verwaltung von Aegypten, tr. F. Wüstenfeld, Göttingen, 1879.
 1441 El-Makrīzī : Khitāt, 2 vols., Būlāk, 1853-4.
 " Histoire des Sultans Mamelouks, tr. E. Quatremère, 2 vols., Paris, 1837-45.
 1469 Abū-l-Mahāsin : Annals (an-Nuṣūm ez-Zāhirah), ed. Juynbōil, 3 vols., Līqd. Bāl., 1855-61.
 1505 Es-Suyūṭī : Husn al-Mutakādara, 2 vols., Būlāk.
 " History of the Caliphs, tr. H. S. Jarrett, Calcutta, 1881.
 1524 Ibn-İyās Kitab Ta'rīkh Mūr, Cairo, 1893.

Other authorities are cited in footnotes.

NOTE ON TRANSLITERATION.

The Arabic alphabet is thus represented. î in the middle of a word by ي (as el-Murraîn), ب b, ت t, ث th, ج غ (English j, but in Lower Egypt pronounced as hard g in "get"), ك kh, د d, ذ dh (as th in "this"), ر r, ز z, س s, ش sh, ص c, ض d, ط t, ظ z, ع ' (as gh), ف f, ق k, ڭ k, ل l, م m, ن n, ه h, و w, ي y. The Persian گ is represented by g. The vowels and diphthongs are أ a or e (according to the rules of imâla), إ u or o, ئ i; ئا, ئى, ئۇ i, ئاۋ, ئىے ey or ay. When a name is repeated the article is often omitted; as El-Hakim and Hakim. Ibn (son) is abbreviated as b. D stands for dinâr, a gold coin worth about half a guinea.

CORRIGENDA

PAGE

40	for Ghauth.	read Ghawth
48	.. Handhala	.. Hançala
76	.. Hârûn	.. Hârûn
85	.. Ghaṭûs	Ghiṭûs
105	.. Hîgâz	Hîgâz
106	Tyy	Tyy
111	.. el-İázûrî	.. el-İázûrî
129	.. Omayyad	.. Omayyad
148	.. Dâhîk	.. Debîk
151	.. Amîr	.. Emîr
155	.. Aydhâb	.. 'Aydhâb
160	.. Hassân	.. Hassân
166	.. Abû Nejâb	.. Abû Negâb
166	.. 'Abdu-el-Megid	.. 'Abd-el-Megid
179	.. Atfîh	.. Atfîh
192	.. Akaba	.. 'Akaba
206	.. naptha	.. naphtha
299	.. Aradus	.. Anteradus
330	.. Sarkhab	.. Sarkhad

A HISTORY OF EGYPT UNDER THE SARACENS

---

CHAPTER I

THE ARAB CONQUEST

639—641

Authorities.—John of Nikiu, Ibn-'Abd-el-Hakam, el-Bilâdhuri, et Tahari. Later accounts from el-Mâqrizi, Abî-l-Mâjâsin, es-Suyûti

MUHAMMAD, the prophet of the Arabs, died in 632. In a few years his followers overran Arabia, Syria, and Chaldaea, defeating the forces of the Emperor of Constantinople and the "Chosroes" or Sâsânian king of Persia; and in 639 the Arabs invaded Egypt. The caliph 'Omar yielded with reluctance to the urgent representations of the general, 'Amr ibn el-'Âsî, and even stipulated that if a letter of recall should reach the army before it entered Egyptian territory, it was to march back to Medina. The letter was sent, but 'Amr contrived to cross the frontier before opening it, and thus effected his purpose. He had visited Alexandria in his youth, and had never forgotten its wealth. The expedition was arranged whilst the caliph and 'Amr were together near Damascus on their return from Jerusalem in the autumn of 639, and 'Amir kept the Feast of Sacrifice (10 Dhu-l-Hijja, A.H. 15), 12 Dec., 639, at el-Arish, the front er town of Egypt.

B

The invading army mustered 1500 or 4000 men, but was quickly reinforced by a second body of 4000. They were almost all horsemen, armed with lances and swords and bows. The first opposition the Saracens met was at Pelusium (el-Farama), where the Roman<sup>1</sup> garrison held out for a month, until the success of the besiegers was attained partly through the aid of the Copt or native Egyptian population, who were eager to welcome any prospect of release from the oppression of the eastern empire. The schism definitely opened at the council of Chalcedon in A.D. 451 had established a sharp hostility between the national monophysite or "Jacobite" church of Egypt and the official "Chalcedonian" or "Melekitic" church which the emperors of Constantinople supported in Egypt; and the Melekitic persecution of the Jacobites, who formed the great bulk of the Egyptians, had alienated whatever trace of loyalty the people might have retained towards their distant sovereigns, and had prepared the way for foreign intervention. Indeed, the Persians had quite lately (616) conquered the country, and had only been ejected by the Romans a few years (626) before the Arab invasion. The Egyptians had served many foreign masters, and had suffered under all so that a change of rulers signified little, and any change from Byzantine intolerance would probably, in their eyes, be for the better. This widespread disaffection contributed to the easy triumph of the Arabs. It was first seen in the taking of Pelusium, when the patriarch, called by the Arabs "Abu-Miay-min" (possibly meaning the banished Jacobite patriarch Benjamin), advised the Copts to support the invaders.

The Romans made a second stand at Bilbeys, some thirty miles from Misr, where another month was spent in the siege'; and after the fall of Bilbeys, 'Amr had again to fight the Romans at Umm-Dunayl, a village or suburb which stood near the present 'Abdin quarter of Cairo. The Saracens were once more successful, but before proceeding further 'Amr appealed to the caliph for more troops, and a second reinforcement was sent, bringing the army up to 12,000 men.<sup>1</sup> Part of this force was on the west bank of the Nile, advancing upon Asyut and Behnesa, and trying to penetrate into the Fayum, where they were opposed by Theodoreus the dux of the Thebaid, and by the general John of Alros; but the main body was on the east bank, posted in the neighbourhood of the city of Migr, or "Babylon of Egypt," a northern extension of the ancient Memphis.<sup>2</sup> The city was defended by a large Roman army, and guarded by a strong fortress, rebuilt by Turbo in 116, the remains of <sup>1</sup> The romantic legend of the defence of Bilbeys by Aramoun, the daughter of the prefect George el-Sukashus, rests only upon the authority of el-Waadi, and cannot be accepted without reserve. It may be read in Mrs. Butcher's Story of the Church of Egypt, p. 359, 360, or more fully in Quatremere's Mémoires sur l'Egypte, p. 11, 54.

<sup>1</sup> The term Roman is used throughout, in preference to Greek, for the east Roman or Byzantine empire. In Arabia the Byzantines are always called an-Rim; in the sing. Rim.

<sup>2</sup> According to another tradition, an Zaiheye brought 12,000 men to reinforce 'Amr. The figures cannot be relied on, but the total force of the Arabs was evidently small.

Memphis still existed, though in decay, at the time of the Arab conquest, but as it is never mentioned by the chroniclers an inhabited portion must be intended when they speak of "Migr." There is much obscurity about this city of Migr at this period, which is increased by the word Migr being used also to signify Egypt. The Arabic writers speak constantly of Babylon (Babyloun) as though it were a fortress and nothing else, and there is very little evidence for the independent existence of a city of Babylon or Migr apart from the fortress. It is only in John of Nikiu's chronicle that we find a distinction between the taking of Migr and the capture of the fortress. In the ninth century, however, Hippocrates and George the Cyprian both mention Memphis, but not Babylon; and there must have been an inhabited city representing the ancient Memphis, and probably forming a more modern and northern extension of it. One would expect to find it on the west bank of the Nile, but at the authorising canon in placing Migr on the east bank, in the neighbourhood of the fortress of Babylon-Tendischa, on the other hand, seems from John of Nikiu's account to have been on the west bank. Memphis was an immense city, and may have extended, with its suburbs of Migr and Tendischa, across the river as far as the fortress of Babylon.

which still stand under the name of Kair-esh-Shemā', "the castle of the candle." Amr divided his forces into three corps, one of which he posted to the north of Babylon, the second was stationed at Tendūnīs (apparently a fortified suburb on the west bank to the south-west of Babylon), and the third withdrew northwards to Heliopolis (On, 'Ayn-Sleims), in the hope of tempting the Romans out of their fortifications, upon which the other two corps were to fall on their rear or flank. The manoeuvre succeeded. The Romans marched out of their fortifications, and attacked the Saracens at Heliopolis, but, being themselves taken in rear by the other divisions, were routed and driven to the Nile, where they took to their boats and fled down the river. Upon this the Muslims occupied Tendūnīs, the garrison of which had perished in the battle, except two men who shut themselves up in the fort, whence they retired by boat to Nīku. The taking of Tendūnīs was evidently followed by, or synonymous with, the taking of the whole city of Mīr, except its citadel which was blockaded, for John of Nīku, from whose almost contemporary chronicle this account is taken, mentions no subsequent siege or conquest of the city of Mīr, but only the later reduction of the fortress.<sup>1</sup> The defeat of the Romans at Heliopolis was so complete that not only Mīr, the chief city of that part, fell into the hands of the Saracens, but even the Fayyūm Dorsentianus, the praesep of Arcadia, secretly escaped from the chief town, deserted the Roman troops scattered about middle Egypt, and hurried down the Nile to Nīku; whereupon the Arabs took Medinet-el-Fayyūm, Asyūt, and eventually Behnesa, with great slaughter.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> In the rubric of John of Nīku's chronicle the conquest of Mīr is carefully distinguished from the conquest of the fortress of Babylon. The former is placed in anno Iudiciorum XIV., which corresponds to 1 Sept. 640—31 Aug. 641, and the fall of Babylon in XV. The latter date cannot be sustained satisfactorily, but the distinction between the two events, and the emphasis laid on the interval between them, are important. The rubric is the work of the Arabic translator, according to Dr. Lütersberg, but it may be assumed that he had earlier data to go upon, otherwise he would scarcely have used the Indiction chronology.

The Arabic accounts of the conquest of Misr conflict with each other and with that given above, in many details, but confirm the main fact of the victory at Heliopolis (which must have taken place before the inundation covered the land, i.e., before September), and record the subsequent occupation of Misr during the inundation. They add various stories of negotiations, and even entertainments between the Egyptians and the Arabs, which ended in a formal treaty. We read of a certain Abū-Maryām, a "catholic" (fātħālikī) of Misr, who joined 'Amr's army, accompanied by a bishop, and endeavoured to arrange terms. 'Amr showed them goodwill, enlarged on the friendly disposition of the late prophet Muḥammad towards the Copts,<sup>1</sup> in virtue of their traditional kinship through Hagar the Egyptian mother of Ishmael, the ancestor of the prophet, and offered them the usual choice—to embrace Islam or to pay the special poll-tax levied by the conquerors on all non-Muslims. Abū-Maryām and the bishop were anxious that the latter alternative should be accepted, but the Roman commander "Artabōn"<sup>2</sup> would not listen to it. He was killed in attempting to surprise the Saracens by a night attack; the battle of Heliopolis followed; ez-Zubeyr escalated Misr and opened a gate, and the Egyptians sued for peace. The treaty ran as follows, according to the Arab tradition recorded by Tabari: "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful, this is the amnesty which 'Amr ibn el-Āṣl granted to the people of Misr, as to themselves, their religion, their goods, their churches and crosses their lands and waters: nothing of these shall be meddled with or diminished; the Nubians shall not be permitted to dwell among them. And the people of Misr, if they enter into this treaty of peace, shall pay the gīzya (poll tax), when the inundation of their river has subsided, fifty thousand thousand.<sup>1</sup> And each one of them is responsible for [acts of violence which] robbers among them may commit. And as for those who will not enter into this treaty the sum of the tax shall be diminished [to the rest] in proportion; but we have no responsibility towards such. If the rise of the Nile is less than usual, the tax shall be reduced in proportion to the decrease. Romans and Nubiens who enter into their [the people of Muārī's] covenant shall be treated in the like manner. And whoso rejects [the treaty] and chooses to go away, he is protected till he reach a place of safety or leave our kingdom. The collection of the taxes shall be by thirds, one third at each time. For [sureties for] this covenant stand the security and warrants of God, and the warrants of His Prophet and the warranty of the caliph, the commander of the faithful, and the warranty of the believers . . . Witnessed by az-Zubayr, and his sons 'Abdallāh and Mūhammad, and written by Wardān." (Tabari i. 238.)

<sup>1</sup> For the traditions see Abū-Salib, . 256, and Mr. Everett's notes and references.

<sup>2</sup> Also called by the Arabs el-Manṣūk (or Manṣhūr) ibn Kukuh and in Arabic nicknamed el-A'raq or el-U'eyraq, "the viper."

The negotiation of this treaty of peace is attributed by most Arabic historians to a certain Gurgis (or Gureyg) or George, son of Almas, al-Mukawki, who has been magnified as the chief ruler of Egypt, and denounced as the supreme traitor to Christianity.<sup>2</sup> At first, indeed, he <sup>1</sup> This is probably a slip for "pay the poll-tax [of two dinars a head] and fifty million dirhems in land-tax (dhāhar)" for it would be the land-tax, not the poll-tax, that would be modified in proportion to the fertility dependent upon the extent of the inundation. Ibn-Khaldūn, quoting registers of the later half of the 8th c., gives the land-tax of Egypt as nearly forty four million dirhems. Abū 'Ishāq (i. 122) that 'Amr imposed a yearly tax of 263 dirhems (i.e. two dinars) on a head, but two dinars and three arshāds of wheat or a bushel were; in this way the country produced twelve million dinars, as the population (he assumes), excluding children and aged men, was six millions. The dinar, henceforward generally abbreviated as D., contained rather more gold than our half sovereign, and may be roughly called a half guinea.

<sup>2</sup> A "Mukawki" had certainly been in communication with the Arabian prophet in 618, and had sent him two slave-girls, a white mule, a pot of Bechtu honey, and other gifts, one of the camels Mary the Copt, of the caravans became the Apostle's concubine; but since Mukawki is stated by the Arabic writers to be only the title of the successive Roman governors of Egypt (possibly a corruption of the

opposed the Saracens but after the fall of Mier, during which he and most of the troops are said to have retreated to the opposite island (afterwards called "the Island of the Garden," G'atrater-Ruqa), he opened communications with 'Amr, hoping to obtain easier terms if he could manage to conclude a treaty before the inundation subsided, which then hemmed in the Muslims, and peace was made on the basis of a poll-tax of two dirhams (about a gumea) per head, excluding women and children and aged men, together with a moderate land-tax, and the obligation of three days' hospitality to Muslims—apparently a form of contribution to the keep of the Arab army. The Egyptians accepted these terms, and the Romans were given the choice of acceptance or a retreat to Alexandria.<sup>1</sup> When the Greek writers, "μεταγλωττοί," as suggested by Karabekir Miskell and S. Seznec d. Piffr. Erzherzog Kaiser, I. 5-11), Muhammad's correspondent may have been a different person from the 'Amawis of 640. That 'Amr had relations with a certain "George the prefect" is clear, for John of Nicaea writes that, after the conquest of Mier and the Fayoum, 'Amr "then ordered to George the prefect to make a bridge over the canal of Kalyub, to facilitate his conquests in the delta, and adds that "it was then that they [the Egyptians] began to assist the Muslims." This George, who may have been praeses of Augustamnia (Migne, Egypt under Roman Rule, 225), was probably George, son of Steven, the Melkaphus of the Arab traditions (though they make him the governor of all Egypt, rising from Alexandria), and his assistance after the taking of Mier supplies a clue to the elaborate stories reared by the Arabic chroniclers. 'Amr's orders to George imply previous relations, and as some one must have conducted the peace negotiations on the Copt side, and as it was more likely to be an Egyptian than a Roman, there is no improbability in the Arab tradition that el-Mujawis was the negotiator.

<sup>1</sup> Probably it is this treaty that is referred to by Nicentoros, who says (1.1. ed. Bonn) that the patriarch Cyrus (perhaps the "bishop" of the Arabic tradition) was recalled to Constantinople by the emperor Heraclius, and censured for having agreed to pay tribute to the Muslims. Theophanes (3.1.1. ed. Bonn) also mentions a treaty, by which Cyrus agreed to pay 'Amr 120,000 denarii, and did pay this tribute for three years—but he seems to refer to the second treaty on the surrender of Alexandria. In the confused accounts of the Greek writers there is a prevailing idea that the patriarch agreed at an early date to pay tribute to the Arabs. See J. B. Bury, LATER ROMAN EMPIRE, II. 273.

emperor repudiated the treaty, the Mukawiks went to 'Amr, and said, though the Romans continued the war, he would stand by his word. He begged three things of the Arab general—that the covenant with the Egyptians should not be broken; that no peace should be made with the Romans until they were all made slaves, as they deserved, and their goods declared spoils; and that, if he died, he might be buried in the church of St. John at Alexandria. 'Amr agreed, and thenceforth most of the Egyptians, or Copts as they may now be called, abetted the Muslims in the war against the Romans, and helped in the transport and supplies.

'Amr's first proceeding after the taking of Misr was to make a bridge near the city so as to reopen communications with the west bank. The pontoon also served to arrest the procession of fugitive Romans down the river to Nikia and Alexandria. Having got his men together, and brought the detachments from the west bank across to the east, he vigorously pressed the siege of the fortress of Babylon, which at length fell, on 9 April, 641.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>40</sup> The Arabic historians relate various anecdotes of the siege of Babylon which are chiefly interesting as representing current traditions as to the impression produced by the invaders upon the Romans and Egyptians. The simplicity of manners, devoutness, and heroic courage of the Arabs are chiefly dwelt upon. For example, it is told how an Arab dismounted one day from his horse to say his appointed prayers, when a party of Romans, richly accoutred, sallied out of the fortress to surprise him. As they drew near, he interrupted his devotions, mounted his horse, and charged upon them. Taken aback by his hardihood, they took to their heels, throwing down their arms and accoutrements in their haste. The Arab took no notice of these spoils, but after chasing them into the fortress, quietly returned to the spot where he had been disturbed, and finished his prayers. Again, when the messengers from the Mukawīs, after being entertained some days in 'Amr's camp, returned to their master, he asked them to describe the Arabs. They answered, "We found a people who love death better than life, and set humility above pride, who have no desire or enjoyment in this world, who sit in the dust and eat upon their knees, but frequently and thoroughly wash all their members, and humble themselves in prayer : a people in whom the stronger can scarce be distinguished from the weaker, or the master from the slave."

<sup>1</sup> This date is John of Nikia's, who says it was the second day after Easter, though he gives the wrong year, XV Ind., instead of XIV (cp. Brooks, Byz. Zeitschr. IV, 440). It is confirmed by the Persian version of Tabari which places the fall of Babylon in the month Rabī' II of A.H. 20 (20 March—17 April, 641), but this is not in the Leyden edition of the Arabic text.

When the fortress of Babylon was taken, the Arab general prepared to march north as soon as the Nile had returned to its banks. After the victory at Heliopolis, he had sent several detachments to different parts, to the Sa'id (Upper Egypt) and the Fayōm, as well as north towards Alexandria, Damietta, and Tūnis on the coast. They met with little resistance in most parts, and imposed the usual terms (poll tax and land tax) upon the submissive population ; the Roman troops were concentrated in a few large cities. 'Amr himself, after establishing a strong force at Mier, and mooring a fleet of boats under the wall of the fortress, at that time washed by the Nile, marched down the east bank to engage Theodorus the augustal prefect. He found however, that the prefect and most of the Roman army had retired to Alexandria, leaving Domentianus at Nikiu, and Dares of Semennūd to guard "the two rivers." On the approach of the Arabs Domentianus fled from Nikiu and took boat for Alexandria. The Arabs then entered Nikiu unopposed on 13 May, 641 (18 Genbūt, Ind. xv. [Ige xiv.] according to John of Nikiu), and are said to have massacred all the inhabitants and perpetrated atrocious cruelty throughout the "island of Nikiu," enclosed between the arms of the Nile. From Nikiu 'Amr pressed northwards, taking Athribis and Busiris, Damis and Sakha, anxious to subdue the whole of the delta before the inundation should check operations. He was repulsed, however, at Damietta, and finding himself impeded by the canals and arms of the river, returned to Misr, whence he made a fresh start. Choosing this time the west bank, he marched by way of Terenuthis, fought three battles with the Romans, and reached Kirbyawn, twenty miles south of Alexandria. The first attack was repulsed, but the capital was then torn by factions, "Blues" and "Greens," Byzantines and Nationals, Greeks and Copts, and was in no condition for resistance; Theodosius, the augustal prefect, was at Rhodes, and Domentianus was a poor substitute, and was at enmity with his colleague, Menas, the prefect of Lower Egypt. The distracted state of the city and the general panic alone explain the surrender of a well-fortified stronghold which could be provisioned and reinforced at will by sea.

Accordingly, when the Arabs arrived near Alexandria, they found the enemy eager to treat. The report of a man who served under 'Amr at the taking of Misr and Alexandria has been handed down and preserved by Tabari (i. 281-2). This man, Ziyad al-Zubaydi, said that after taking Babylon the Muslim army advanced into the Rif (delta) between Misr and Alexandria, and arrived at Belhib, where the governor of Alexandria sent to 'Amr, offering to pay the poll-tax on condition that the Roman prisoners should be surrendered. 'Amr replied that he must refer the proposal to the caliph at Medina; he wrote what the governor had said, and the letter was read to the troops. They waited at Belhib, during the armistice, till the caliph 'Omar's answer came. 'Amr read it aloud. It required the Alexandrians to pay the poll-tax; the prisoners were to be given the choice of accepting Islam or remaining true to the religion of their own folk; if they chose Islam, they belonged to the Muslims; if they held to their own creed, they should be sent back to Alexandria; but those prisoners who had already been sent to Arabia could not be returned. So they gave the remaining prisoners their choice, and when some chose Islam the army shouted "Allahu Akbar," "God is Most Great,"—

"it was the loudest Te Deum (tekbir)," said Ziyad, "that we had shouted since we conquered the land." The rest returned to Alexandria, and the amount of the poll tax was fixed. Thus Alexandria capitulated and the Muslims entered in.

John of Nikiu, like Ziyad, mentions no prolonged siege of Alexandria, but says that the patriarch Cyrus, who had returned from Constantinople armed with full powers to treat, went to 'Amr at Babylon<sup>1</sup> to propose terms of peace and offer tribute, and it was settled that the Alexandrians should pay a monthly tribute, and deliver up 150 soldiers and 50 civilians as hostages; that the Muslims should not interfere with the churches and affairs of the Christians; that the Jews (who doubtless helped to furnish the tribute money), should be allowed to remain at Alexandria; and that the Muslims should hold aloof from the city for eleven months, after which the Romans would embark and leave the city, and no other Roman army would be sent to regain it. They embarked on 17 September (642), which, if the term of eleven months was strictly observed, would make the date of the treaty of capitulation October, 643.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Possibly a transcriber's error for Belhib; the two could be easily confounded in a careless Arabic MS., from which the Ethiopic version of John of Nikiu appears to have been made. But as Cyrus was back in Egypt before Easter, 643, he might have found 'Amr at Babylon, and there began the negotiations which were concluded at Belhib.

<sup>2</sup> The received tradition, however, recorded by many of the Arab historians, is that Alexandria endured a siege of fourteen months, during which the Muslims lost more than 20,000 men; and many incidents of this siege have been handed down, some of which may really refer to the later reconquest of the city in 643. They state that at the time of the battle of Melispolis several detachments were sent to various parts of Egypt, and one went to Alexandria. There may have been a corps of observation near Alexandria for fourteen months, but the story of a siege is contradicted by Ziyad's plain tale as well as by John of Nikiu. The Arab siege material moreover, must have been extremely weak. Though they early made use of mangonels and stone-slings, these could hardly have been powerful enough to reduce the fort of Alexandria. The legends of 'Amr being made prisoner, and sheltering discovery by the presence of mind of his slave, and of his narrow escape in a boat, are improbable. What the relations were between the Muslims and the Romans during the eleven months of

The Muslim writers describe Alexandria as it was in 642 with their customary exaggeration—it had, they say, 400 theatres, 4000 public baths, &c., and its population numbered 600,000 (without reckoning women and children), of whom 200,000 were Romans, and 70,000 Jews. Of any destruction or spoliation by the Arabs there is not a word in any of the early authorities, nor, since the city capitulated on terms, was any spoliation permissible. John of Nikiu records that 'Amr levied the taxes agreed upon, but took nothing from the churches, nor wrought any deed of pillage or spoliation, but protected them throughout his government. The story of the destruction of "the Alexandrian library," and the distributing of the books to light the fires in the 4000 public baths, is found in no early record. It is not mentioned by any Greek writer, nor by John of Nikiu, Ibn-Al-Hakam, or Tabari. It first appears in the thirteenth century, six hundred years after the alleged event in the works of 'Abd-el-Latif and Abu-Farag. It is absolutely contradictory to John of Nikiu's account of 'Amr's protecting policy. The legend may have had its origin in the destruction of books of the fire-worshippers during the Arab conquest of Persia.

grace we do not know. It is recorded by John of Nikiu that the Muslims came to Alexandria to collect the poll-tax, and that disturbances ensued, which were allayed by Cyril the patriarch—but whether, after this, the Muslims occupied Alexandria, as the Arabic historians would have us believe, or (as seems more probable) received the tax outside the city, and observed the truce, there is no evidence to show. According to a tradition repeated by several Arabic historians, Alexandria was taken by storm, but almost immediately retaken by the Romans, who were then driven out a second time, and fled by sea and land, but this may refer either to the disturbances caused by the collection of the poll-tax, or to the second conquest of Alexandria from Manuel in 645. The fact, generally admitted, that the Alexandrians were allowed to pay the poll-tax, instead of having all their property confiscated, is presumptive evidence of a capitulation, though some of the chroniclers explain it away as an act of grace. There was an obvious motive on the part of the Arabs to represent that Egypt was conquered te et amissis, because a country so conquered would, according to Mohammedan law, be deprived of all rights, and be exposed to confiscations, which would not be the case if it had capitulated upon terms.

One anecdote of the alleged siege of Alexandria may be quoted as illustrating the spirit which inspired the Arab warriors. 'Amr's son 'Abdallah was severely wounded, and groaning in his pain he let the regret escape that his father would not lead his army back to peace and rest. 'Amr's reply was typical of the race. "Rest," he said, "is in front of you, not behind."

<sup>1</sup> The chronology of the Arab conquest of Egypt is almost hopelessly bewildering, and the difficulties are too great to be discussed here. The account given above is based chiefly upon John of Nikiu and Ibn 'Abd-al-Hakam, compared with Tabari and later historians. John's chronicle, however, is obviously compressed in some of its chapters, and I have transcribed clauses extra-sive to weed out. I might add to say that Mr. E. A. Brooks, who has carefully examined the source in the Byzantinische Zeitschrift, iv. 435-444, has arrived independently at the same conclusions with regard to this transposition. It may set the connection of the date XV. Ind. in ch. xv for the northern march to Babylon which must have been in the late spring or early summer (before the month said to begin i.e. XV. Ind.). In the same way the XV. Ind. given in the rubric for the fall of Babylon fortress must be connected with XV. Ind. 19, 20, 21, 22 comprising in each case a version translated from a genuine Arabic version of a probable Coptic original. The one valuable date supplied by the Arabic historians is Ibn 'Abd-al-Hakam's statement that "Amr celebrated the Pasch of Easter, 16 1/2 Migr., a.s. 18, i.e. 11 Dec., 640, at Al-Arish on entering Egypt; the other dates of Arabic writers frequently conflict with each other and cannot be relied upon, but the references to the Pasch celebration help to fix the season and order of events." The one date in John of Nikiu on which there seems to be no ground for doubt is that of the death of the usurper Cyrus on "25 August the Thursday before Easter," which can only be at March, 642. The importance of this date is that it fixes the last celebration of Easter by Cyrus (a ceremony specially described by John as Easter, 641), and makes his negotiation of the capitulation of Alexandria, for which he had been sent back by the emperor armed with full powers, fall certainly in 641, not 642. Another important indication is furnished by the Arabic historian's statement that Alexandria capitulated just month after the death of Ismael. Its death took place on Dec. 11, 641, and the ninth month would therefore fall in October to November, which allows the stated term of eleven months before the evacuation on Sept. 19, 642. The traditional Arabic date for the capitulation, 1 Muharram, 16 & II (1st Dec., 640), is incredible as to the month, but the year so given by the earliest chronicler, Ibn 'Abd-al-Hakam and al-Wahidi as quoted by Tabari, is 276 H. for the conquest of Babylon and Alexandria, agrees with the date given above, and is confirmed by Ibn 'Abd-al-Hakam's statement that Alexandria fell in the eighth year

CHAPTER II

A PROVINCE OF THE CALIPHATE

641—868

Authorities.—Ibn-'Abd-el-Hakam; Abū-Šalih, Ibn-Khalīkān, el-Makrūz, Abū'l-Mahāsim, es-Suyūtī.

Monuments.—Nilometer on island of er-Rūda.

Inscriptions.—Gravestones from Fustāt are at Aswan in Cairo Museum, Miss. archéol. française, Egypt. Inst., and private collections at Cairo, and a few in Europe (Brit. Mus., Louvre, Vatican).

Coin.—A few of the caliphal coins struck at Misr (Fustāt) bear the names of governors.

Glass weights and stamps.—Many show the names of governors, treasurers, and other officials (see pp. 47—56).

641. THE surrender of Alexandria was the last important act in the conquest of Egypt. No serious resistance was encountered elsewhere, and the whole country from Eyla on the Red Sea to Barka on the Mediterranean, and from the first cataract of the Nile to its embouchure, became a province of the Muslim caliphate. The Arabs spread over the country during the winter of 641-2, restoring order and levying taxes, for 'Amr was not the man to keep them idle : "Go forth," he said "now that the season is gracious : when the milk curdles, and the of the reign of 'Omar, which began in the middle of A.H. 20. The two dates, April and October, 641, for the taking of Babylon and the capitulation of Alexandria respectively, completely beat out the prevalent Arabic tradition that Babylon fell after a seven months' siege, and Alexandria after fourteen months. The siege of Babylon would thus have begun in Sept., 640, immediately after the fall of Misr, during the inundation, and the appearance of the Arabs in the neighbourhood of Alexandria (though not a siege) would be brought to the same month.

leaves wither and the mosquitoes multiply, come back to your tents." Even Nubia was made tributary by an expedition of 20,000 men, under 'Amr's lieutenant 'Abd-alkhā h-Sādī. The Copts, who had aided the invaders, welcomed the change of masters, and were rewarded. 'Amr retained Menas the prefect in his government for a time, and appointed Shmūdah and Philoxenos governors of the Rif and the Fayyūm: all three were of course friendly with the Muslims, and exerted themselves to levy the taxes. Alexandria the monthly tribute of which was rated at 12,000 pieces of gold<sup>1</sup> was squeezed by Menas till it paid over 35,000. Many Egyptians became Muhammadans to escape the poll-tax; others hid themselves because they could not pay. In the country towns and villages, the conquerors mixed with the conquered, and the maidens of Sulteys in the delta became the mothers of famous Muslims by their willing union with Arab warriors.

The capital of Egypt was no longer to be Alexandria. The great commercial emporium was liable to be cut off by the Nile inundation from land communication with Medina, then the seat of the caliphate; and the caliph 'Omar was so far from thinking of permanent colonisation, and so averse from depriving himself of the services of 'Amr's fine army, that he forbade the soldiers to acquire land and take root in Egypt, in order that they might always be ready for a fresh campaign elsewhere. Alexandria, moreover, was the symbol of Roman dominion and the tyranny of the orthodox church, and was therefore distasteful to the Copts. 'Amr was ordered by the caliph to select a more central position, and he chose the plain close to the fortress of Babylon, and not far north of the old Egyptian capital Memphis, where his camp had been pitched during the siege of Miṣr. Here he built his mosque, which still stands, though repeatedly altered or restored;<sup>1</sup> and here he began the foundation of the city which he called el-Fustat, "the tent," on the spot where, according to the story, when he marched north to take Alexandria his tent had been left standing, because he would not suffer his laries to disturb the doves which were building their nest there. Fustat remained the capital of Egypt for more than three centuries, until el-Kahira (Cairo) was founded close by in 969, and, even after that, it continued to be the commercial, as distinguished from the official, capital, until burned on the invasion of the crusading king Amalric in 1169. "The site of Fustat," says el-Maqrizi (Khitat, i. 286), the most learned authority on Egyptian topography, "which is now called the city of Misr, was waste land and sown fields from the Nile to the eastern mountain called Gebel-el-Mukattam . . . there were no buildings there except the fortress, now called the Castle of the Candle (Kasr-esh-Shemā);<sup>2</sup> and el-Motallaka. There the Roman governor who ruled Egypt for the Caesars used to stay when he came from Alexandria . . . This fortress overlooked the Nile, and the boats came close up to the western gate . . . In the neighbourhood of the fortress on the north were trees and vineyards, and this became the site of the Old Mosque [or Mosque of 'Amr]. Between the fortress and the mountain were many churches and convents of the Christians." The new capital spread rapidly, and soon became one of the chief cities of the Mohammedan empire.

<sup>1</sup> Three must be solidi, represented by the Arabic dirh. Belādhuri mentions (223) that the poll-tax of Alexandria in about 730 was raised from the previous sum of 18,000 to 36,000 D. At the rate of two dirhās a head per annum, this monthly payment implies a taxable male population not exceeding 192,000 in 'Amr's time, and 216,000 a century later.

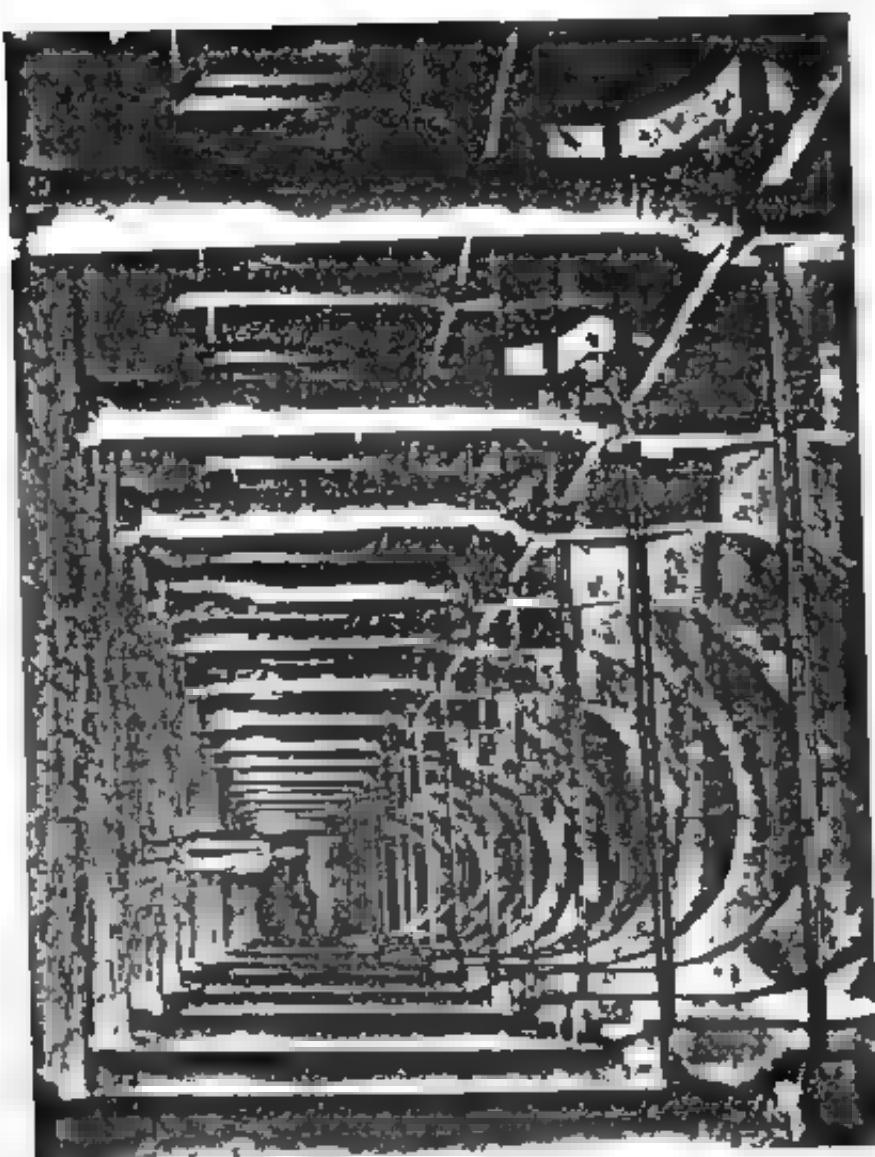

FIG. 1.—Mosque of 'Amr al-Fusqat.

<sup>1</sup> Nothing of the original structure remains. It was "a simple oblong room, 26.9 metres by 17.3; the low roof, no doubt, supported by a few columns, . . . . the walls probably of baked, but very possibly only unburned, brick, and unplastered, the floor pebble screwe; the light probably supplied, as in the great colonnade at the present day, through square apertures in the roof. It possessed no mihrabs or other attractive outside feature, no niche nor any other internal decoration" (E. K. Coriat, J. A. S., v. 2, 201). In this humble building the conqueror of Egypt, as the caliph's representative, led the public prayers, and preached the sermon, standing on the floor, for the caliph forbade the elevation of a pulpit. 'Amr's own house was opposite the main entrance of the mosque.

<sup>2</sup> Possibly from the candles used in the Coptic churches there. Mr. A. J. Butler suggests (Abū-Sa'īd, f. 216) that the name may be a corruption of Kasr-el-Khemā, the "castle of Egypt."

Henceforward, for two centuries and a quarter, Egypt was but one of the provinces of the Muslim caliphate. The Arabs appear to have made no sweeping changes in its administration : they were a conspicuously adaptive folk, and were generally content to accept other people's ideas. In Egypt they found a system of government ready-made, and they adopted the plan of their Roman predecessors—a plan doubtless moulded on time-honoured precedent—with little modification.<sup>1</sup> The system lasted in all essentials down to the present century, and developed into a completely decentralized series of inferior governments loosely related to the chief government at Fustat. The village sheykhis were subordinate to the district governors who in turn reported to the governor-general ; but the central government interfered little with the district officers, or these with the peasants (fellahin), so long as the taxes were paid, and the whole machinery of government was directed to the end of collecting as large a revenue as possible. A special department, however, had charge of the irrigation, and appointed inspectors annually to see to the maintenance of the government dikes and dams ; but the local dikes were left to the management of each separate village or town, and paid for out of the local funds. The governor was appointed by the caliph ; and the governor usually appointed the three great officers of state, for war, justice, and finance—the marshal, the chief kādi, and the treasurer. The marshal had command of the guard, controlled the army and police, and maintained order. The kādi was the chief judge, he was also the controller of the mint (at least down to the 13th century), and represented religion and law ; the treasurer looked to the collection of the taxes, and so important was his office that he was often appointed directly by the caliph, and held a position independent of the governor. It was his duty, after collecting the taxes and paying the expenses of government, to hand over the surplus to the supreme treasury of the caliph. Sometimes he earned the revenues for a fixed payment to the caliph's treasury, and made what he could out of the taxes. Sometimes the governor combined the office of treasurer with his proper political functions. In any case, no doubt a considerable balance stuck in the pockets of the officials, and did not find its way to the caliph. The frequent changes of governors and the uncertainty of their tenure rendered some such economy almost inevitable, as is still the case in the Ottoman empire.

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Milne (Egypt under Roman Rule, 216) has shown that the nudjat, or governors of provinces, corresponded to the epulatologos, the magistrus, or sub-provincial governor, performed the duties of the toparch, and partly of the strategos ; and the land-inspector, khuī, was the ancient metropolis. The taxation, however, seems to have been much heavier under late Roman rule than under the Arabs.

'Amr, from his new capital of Fustat, directed the raising of the necessary revenue. He collected one million dinars from the poll-tax alone in the first year, four million in the second, and eight in the third year (642, 643, and 644), a progression which shows that the country was not immediately brought under financial control. The total revenue he was able to raise amounted to 12,000,000 D., on a population estimated by Ibn-'Abd-el-Hakam at from six to eight millions, excluding women and children. The total was probably made up of about 3,000,000 land-tax on a million and a half of cultivated acres, 8,000,000 poll-tax on four million male adults, and 1,000,000 various duties and contributions.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> It is impossible to reconcile the various estimates of the Arab treasurer satisfactorily. 'Amr is stated to have raised eight million dinars from the poll-tax, which implies a taxable male population of four (not six or eight) millions. But Ya'kub places the poll-tax of Egypt in 640 at five million dinars, implying a population of two-and-a-half million adult males, or else a very large conversion of the Copts to Islam in order to evade the tax, which according to all authorities was not the case. The land-tax in the latter part of the 8th c. was forty-four million dirhems (or three-and-one-third million dinars), which tallies well enough with the fifty millions fixed by 'Amr in the treaty of 640. In the first half of the 9th c. the land-tax had increased to nearly four-and-three-quarter million D. El-Baladhuri says

The policy of the caliph enjoined a generous treatment of the cultivators of the soil, and we hear of harshness only where wealthy Copts endeavoured to conceal their resources and evade the taxes; the consequence was confiscation, sometimes to a fabulous amount. 'Amr developed the productiveness of the land by irrigation, and the immemorial cornic system was enforced. 120,000 labourers were kept at work winter and summer in maintaining and improving the dams and canals. The old canal, traditionally called the Astris Trajanus, connecting Babylon with the Red Sea, which had long been choked up, was cleared and reopened in less than a year,<sup>1</sup> and corn was sent by ships to Medina, instead of by caravan as in the previous year. In spite of this efficient and prudent administration, the caliph was dissatisfied with the small revenue received from Egypt,<sup>2</sup> and reduced 'Amr to the inferior office of governor of the delta, whilst the Sa'id, or Upper Egypt, was placed under the authority of 'Abdallah ibn Sa'd, who was soon afterwards (on the murder of the caliph 'Omar) appointed governor of all Egypt.

Before he left, however, 'Amr achieved another signal success. A Roman fleet of 300 sail, under Manuel, an Armenian, supported by the Roman population in the delta, seized Alexandria in 645, and the Copts, dreading that at the end of the 9th c. the total revenue was fixed at four dinars a head, but this looks like a mere combination of the two dinar tax per head and the two dinar tax per acre.

<sup>1</sup> In A.D. 53 (beginning in Nov., 643) according to el Kindi. It ran past Bubays to the Crocodile Lake and then down to Kalmum, the port at the head of the Red Sea. It remained open for about eighty years, after which it was neglected and again became choked up, until reopened in the caliphate of el Mahdi, c. 780. The picturesque but malodorous canal (el Khal'ī) flowed through Cairo for some distance to the N.E. until 1809, when it was filled up for sanitary reasons. Its connection with the Crocodile Lake had long ceased, and its place was taken by the still older Busiris or "Freshwater Canal."

<sup>2</sup> The authentic correspondence on this subject between the caliph and 'Amr is preserved in Ibn-'Aby-e-Hakam, and shows that 'Umar regarded Egypt chiefly in the light of a milk-cow, whose milk was to nourish the faithful at Medina rather than fatten the governor at Fustat.

a restoration of the hated Melekite domination, entreated that their old champion might be sent against the enemy. 'Amr hastened with an army by land and water towards Alexandria, and encountered the Romans near Nikiu. The imperial archers covered the landing of the troops from the river, and the Arabs suffered heavy loss. Amr's horse was shot under him, and some noted warriors began to fly. At this moment a Roman captain challenged the Muslims to single combat; a champion rode out from their ranks, and both armies stood under arms while the duel was fought out. After an hour's sword-play, the Arab killed his opponent with a knife. Encouraged by this, the Muslims attacked the enemy with such fury that they broke and fled to Alexandria with the loss of their general. The spot where the victory was won was commemorated by the building of the 'Mosque of (Divine) Pity.' The walls of Alexandria were then destroyed, as 'Amr said, "so that men could go in at every side as to the house of a harlot." As a reward for this service the successful general was offered the command of the troops of Egypt, but not the governorship he declined the honour in the pithy phrase, "I might as well hold the cow by the horns whilst another milked her."

The new governor, 'Abdallah b. Sa'd,<sup>1</sup> bestirred himself to emulate the deeds of his predecessor. In 651-2 he invaded Nubia, laid siege to Dongola, battered down the Christian church with his stone slings, and compelled the blacks to sue for peace. The treaty then concluded has been preserved by Ibn-Selim, as quoted by Mahrizi, and is a curious document:—

"In the name of God, &c.—This is a treaty granted by the emir 'Abdallah ibn Sa'd ibn Abi-Sarh to the chief of the Nubians and to all the people of his dominions, a treaty binding on great and small among them, from the frontier of Aswan to the frontier of 'Alwa. 'Abdal'ah b. Suh ordains security and peace between them and the Muslims, their neighbours in the Sand [Upper Egypt], as well as all other Muslims and their tributaries. Ye people of Nubia, ye shall dwell in safety under the guard of God and his apostle, Mohammad the prophet, whom God bless and save. We will not attack you, nor wage war on you, nor make incursions against you, so long as ye abide by the terms settled between us and you. When ye enter our country, it shall be but as travellers, not as settlers, and when we enter your country it shall be but as travellers not settlers. Ye shall protect those Muslims or their allies who come into your land and travel there, until they quit it. Ye shall give up the slaves of Muslims who seek refuge among you, and send them back to the country of Islam; and likewise the Muslim fugitive who is at war with the Muslims, him ye shall expel from your country to the realm of Islam; ye shall not espouse his cause nor prevent his capture. Ye shall put no obstacle in the way of a Muslim but render him aid till he quit your territory. Ye shall take care of the mosque which the Muslims have built in the outskirts of your city, and hinder none from praying there; ye shall clean it, and light it, and honour it. Every year ye shall pay 360 head of slaves to the leader of the Muslims [i.e. the caliph], of the middle class of slaves of your country, without bodily defects, males and females, but no old men nor old women nor young children. Ye shall deliver them to the governor of Aswan. No Muslim shall be bound to repulse an enemy from you or to attack him, or hinder him, from 'Alwa to Aswan. If ye harbour a Muslim slave, or kill a Muslim or an ally, or attempt to destroy the mosque which the Muslims have built in the outskirts of your city, or withhold any of the 360 head of slaves—then this promised peace and security will be withdrawn from you, and we shall revert to hostility, until God decide between us, and He is the best of umpires. For our performance of these conditions we pledge our word, in the name of God, and our compact and faith, and belief in the name of His apostle Mohammad, God bless and save him. And for your performance of the same ye pledge yourselves by all that ye hold most sacred in your religion, by the Messiah and by the apostles and by all whom ye revere in your creed and religion. And God is witness of these things between us and you. Written by 'Amr b. Shurahib in Ramadán in the year 31." (May-June, 652 A.D.)

<sup>1</sup> The abbreviation b. stands for ibn, "son of." The classical form of this name is 'Abdu-l-lâh-i-bu Sa'd, but in this history the inflexional terminations are disregarded, as they are in Egyptian colloquial usage.

Before this treaty the bait, or annual tribute of "two head of slaves," had been paid to 'Amr b. el-'As, together with forty slaves whom he declined to accept as a present, but paid for in corn and provisions. This exchange continued for a long time. The bait of two slaves was regularly paid every year to an Egyptian officer at el Kāf, five miles from Aswān, the frontier town of Egypt, and forty slaves in addition were exchanged for wheat, barley, lentils, cloth, and horses. The treaty and the slave tribute remained in force down to Mamluk times, more than six centuries later.

Three years after the Nubian campaign, a Roman fleet of 700 to 1000 sail appeared off Alexandria. The Muslims had only 200 ships to oppose the invasion, but after volleys of arrows, and when these were exhausted, of stones, they came to close quarters and fought sword to sword, till the Romans were put to flight. From the forest of rigging the engagement acquired the name of "the Battle of the Masts." Henceforth, for centuries, in spite of occasional raids by the emperors' fleets, Egypt was secure from foreign attack. Meanwhile 'Abdallah pressed the taxes, and succeeded in raising a revenue of 14,000,000 D. The caliph 'Othmān, at Medina, observed to 'Amr that "the camel yields more milk now." "Yes," was the reply, "but to the hurt of her young." The result, indeed, was widespread disaffection. The people rose, drove the vice-governor out of Fustāt, proclaimed the deposition of the caliph, refused to admit 'Abdallah when he returned from a journey to Palestine, and sent a force of rebels to Medina to demand the appointment of a governor of their own choice. An intercepted letter, which seemed to argue double-dealing on the caliph's part, embittered the controversy, and the Egyptian Arabs at Medina took a leading share in the events which ended in the murder of 'Othmān. The contest over the succession to the caliphate was fought out in Egypt, as elsewhere; 'Ali, the new caliph, was strongly supported, and sent a governor to Fustat, who read his commission aloud in the mosque of 'Amr. He was removed by intrigues, and the next governor was poisoned before he even reached his seat of government. Ten thousand men, pledged to avenge the murder of 'Othmān, established themselves at Khanibā, in the Hawf (or eastern part of the delta) and defied authority. With their support, and backed by 5000 Syrian troops, joined by as many Egyptians, 'Amr, the nominee of the rival caliph Mu'āwiya, re-entered Fustat in July, 658, after defeating the governor's army, and put an end to the authority of 'Ali in Egypt.<sup>1</sup> The conqueror's second government lasted over five years, but was marked by few important events beyond a couple of expeditions against the Berbers of Libya. In view of his great services, Mu'āwiya, first of the Omayyad caliphs of Damascus, granted him the entire revenue of Egypt, after payment of the cost of administration; and so large was the surplus that when 'Amr died, in January, 664, at the age of ninety, he left seventy sacks of dinars, each of which weighed ten bushels (two ardebbs.) At about 160 lbs. to the ardebb, this would amount to the wholly impossible amount of ten tons of gold! It is said (but in the Arab historians' qualifying phrase, "God knows best") that his sons refused to inherit their ill-gotten treasure.

A record of the several reigns of the ninety-eight governors who ruled Egypt under the successive caliphs of Medina, Damascus and Bagdad, up to the time when Ibn-Talūn established a practically independent dynasty in 868, would serve little purpose. The system was the same all through, but mudness and severity alternated according to the disposition of the governor, or the character of his treasurer and other officials. Several governors are described as generous and upright, benevolent towards the people, and beloved by them. Such were commonly followed by martinet, who restored the treasury balance by treacherous exactions. Honesty was not likely to be the salient virtue among men who were liable to sudden dismissal at the caprice of a caliph; yet it is recorded of Kays b. Sa'd that on his demission he refused to appropriate the house he had built at Fustat because "it was erected with the money of the Muslims" to be the official residence of future governors. Another exceptional ruler, a "God-fearing man, just and incorruptible," used to say "When presents come in at the door, honesty flies out of the window!" Yet it was under this very man that Osâma b. Zeyd carried on a peculiarly oppressive policy, acting on the caliph's instructions, "Milk till the udder be dry, and let blood to the last drop." The normal taxation was not excessive; non-Muslims paid about a guinea a year in poll-tax, and the same amount per cultivated acre (fiddîn, rather more than an English acre) in land-tax.

<sup>1</sup> Their eyne annals may be read in F. Wüstenfeld's Die Statthalter von Ägypten zur Zeit der Chäsern, published in the Abhandl. der Königl. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen, Bd. xx., 1875.

The taxes brought in annually from twelve to fourteen million dinars; and in the first half of the 9th c. the land-tax (of two dinars per acre) amounted to 4,857,000 D., or about 2,500,000*£*. But in Egypt the tax-gatherer did not always content himself with the legal taxes; and apart from such extortion, there were various other duties, on trades and markets, etc., increased and varied from time to time, which swelled the revenue. The Muslim subjects moreover had to pay a tithe as poor-tax, and also a property-tax. At the beginning of the 8th c. the district officials reported the extraordinary intelligence that their treasuries were so full that they could hold no more, and the caliph gave orders that the superfluity should be expended on building mosques. Among others the Mosque of 'Amr was restored, and it is mentioned that when the workmen turned out at an evening and went home, the governor, Kurra, had wine brought into the sacred building, and trooped all night to the strains of music—another way of disposing of the surplus. Some governors, however, rigorously suppressed all wine shops and places of public amusement.

Fig. 2. Glass weight
of Osâma b. Zeyd
[A.D. 720].

The vast majority of the people of Egypt were of course the Christian Copts and whatever oppression existed was mainly borne by them. There is very little evidence, however, to show that they were grossly ill-treated. 'Amr, the conqueror, received an embassy of monks, who asked for a charter of their liberties and the restoration of their patriarch Benjamin; he granted the charter and invited the exiled patriarch to return. The Mamlūk naturally favoured their allies of the national or Jacobite church, rather than the orthodox church of Constantinople, which was still represented in Egypt. The governor Maslūma allowed the Copts to build a church behind the bridge at Fustīt, to the scandal of the faithful; and when 'Abd el-Azīz b. Marwān removed for his health to Hulwān, near Memphis, he chose the Coptic monastery at Tamweyh on the opposite bank of the Nile as his residence,<sup>1</sup> and paid the monks 20,000 D. for it. This is worth noting, because, according to the Muslim theory, Egypt was a conquered country and its inhabitants had no rights, could not own land, and were liable (and too often subjected) to confiscation. On the other hand, his nephew and successor, 'Abdallah, bore heavily upon the people, forbade Christians to wear the burnus, and ordered Arabic to be used in all public documents, instead of Coptic as heretofore. Executions, arbitrary fines, torture and vexatious passports are recorded, and a system of badges to be worn by monks, by way of licence, was devised. If a monk were found without the brand, his monastery was liable to be sacked.

<sup>1</sup> Here he is stated to have struck the fine purely Arabic coins issued in Egypt in A.H. 70 (985), in accordance with the monetary reform of the caliph 'Abd al-Malik. Abu'l-Hasan (§ 26) that 'Abd el-Azīz b. Marwān wished to make Hulwān the capital, and built several mosques there, a pavilion of glass, a Nilometer, a lake and aqueduct, and planted trees. His physician sent him there for the leprosy or his lion-sick ness (ephphazza), on account of the sulphur springs. He also built a palace with a gilt dome "the Golden House" at Fustīt. Qāsim b. Zayd built the first Nilometer on the island of Rōda, formerly called Qasr-as-Sukā, "the island of the artisans" (boat-builders), in 916, which superseded the old Nilometer of Memphis, and was still in use in 944 (Mat'ib, ii. 366). Another Nilometer was erected at the upper end of Rōda in 961, and improved by Ibn Tūlūn in 873; it was stored eighteen cubits' rise, each cubit divided into twenty-four inches (Egyptian).

A still worse oppressor was the treasurer 'Obeyd-allah b. el-Habhab, who in 732, by the caliph's order, carried out a general destruction of the sacred pictures of the Christians. Such persecutions led to a rising of the Copts in the Hawf, between Bilbeys and Damietta, which, although suppressed for the time, broke out again and again in later years, and the imprisonment of a Coptic patriarch aroused such indignation among his co-religionists in Nubia that the king (Cyracius) marched into Egypt at the head of 100,000 Nubians, and was only induced to return to his own country by the request of the patriarch, who was hastily liberated.

Fig. 3.—Glass stamp<sup>1</sup> of 'Obeyd-allah b. el-Habhab, dated 732.

The Muslim historian Makrizi does not attempt to minimize these persecutions, and himself repeats a story of the heroism of one of the religious women who were dragged out of their convents by the Arab soldiers. Febronia was a virgin of such surpassing beauty that her captors could not decide who was to own her. Whilst they were consulting she offered to reveal to their leader the secret of an unguent with which her ancestors used to anoint themselves, and thereby became invulnerable. The captain of the troop agreed to let her go back to her convent if she let him prove the efficacy of the ointment upon herself. "So he went with her into the convent, and she approached the picture of the Lady, and prayed before it, and begged the Virgin to assist her to obtain deliverance." Then she anointed her neck with the oil, and one of the soldiers drew a sharp sword. "And the maiden bent her knees and displayed her neck: but they did not know that which was in her heart. Then she covered her face and said, 'If there is any strong man among you, let him strike with his sword upon my neck, and you will see the power of God in this great secret.' So the man . . . struck with all his might; and her head immediately fell from her body; for it was her purpose by this means to preserve her maidenhood, that she might appear before Christ a pure virgin, as she had been created, without earthly stain. So when the ignorant Bashmurites saw what had befallen the maiden, they knew at last what had been her intention, and they repented and were exceeding sad, and did no injury henceforth to any of those virgins, but let them go."<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> These stamps were impressed on glass bottles by the government as guarantees of standard capacity. The glass weights were used to test the weight of the coins. The inscriptions on both usually include the name of the ruling governor or treasurer, the measure of weight indicated, a word or formula referring to the justness of the weight or measure, and occasionally the date.

It is remarkable that in spite of such intermittent oppression and their inevitable position of inferiority, and also the temptation to escape the poll-tax and all disabilities by the simple process of conversion to Islām, the Copts in general remained steadfast to their faith (they still numbered five millions about 725);<sup>2</sup> insomuch that about 722 the treasurer 'Obeydallah, finding that Islām was making no progress among them, imported 5000 Arabs of the tribe of Kays and settled them in the Hawf to the north-east of Fustat, where they presently formed a hot-bed of revolt. The Arab population, however, apart from this small addition, must have been considerable, though for the first century of Mamlukian rule they were almost confined to the large cities. Most governors appear to have come to Egypt escorted by an Arab army, estimated at different times at 6000, or 10,000, or even 20,000 men; and many of these soldiers most probably settled in the towns, and some certainly intermarried with Copt women. These Arabs were no doubt favoured by government at the expense of the Christians, and at one time we read that 25,000 D. were distributed among the Muslims to pay their debts. Arab tribes from time to time migrated bodily into Egypt. Thus the tribe of e-Kenz (a branch of Rabi'a) settled chiefly in the Saïd in the middle of the ninth century, intermarried with the people, and became an important political factor in later insurrections in the time of the Fatimids and of Saladin.

<sup>1</sup> Abu S. ib., f. 34. - 86a. The story comes from John the Deacon.

<sup>2</sup> El-Kaid in Agh-Saib, f. 200.

The governors of Egypt under the Omayyad caliphs were all Arabs, and four of them were sons or brothers of the reigning caliphs. Two of the Omayyad caliphs themselves visited Egypt: Marwan I. in 684, to defeat the party supporting the rival caliph 'Abdallâh b. Zubeir; and Mar-

Fig. 4.—Glass weight of el-Kâsim b. 'Alîya d. Allâh [730].

Fig. 5.—Glass weight of 'Alîl-el-Mehîk b. Yâd [750].

wân II., who came there in his flight from his victorious supplanters, the 'Abbāsids, crossed at Gīza to Fustāt, and sent troops to hold the Sa'id and Alexandria; but was pursued to the death by the 'Abbāsid general, Ṣalih b. 'Ali, who took possession of Fustāt for the new dynasty in August, 750. The partisans of the late caliph were driven out of the country, or killed at sight.

<sup>250</sup> The change from the Omayyad to the 'Abbāsid caliphs was thus effected in Egypt with little difficulty: indeed some governors who had served the old line were quite willing to accept office under the new, and other leading men of the old régime were taken to the caliph's court to become acclimatized. Their tenure of power, however, was even more precarious, and an 'Abbāsid governor generally ruled only half the brief time that an Omayyad governor had kept his seat.<sup>1</sup> Under the new dynasty a considerable number of the governors belonged to the 'Abbāsid family, and of the others most were Arabs; but in 836 the caliphs began to send Turks, and since then with the exception of the Fatimid caliphs, hardly any Arabs have ever ruled in Egypt. From 834 to the independent rule of Ibn-Tūlūn in 872, the province was given in fief to one or other of the commanders of the caliphs' Turkish bodyguard, or to the caliph's son or brother; these fiefs did not govern in person but appointed a deputy governor to do the work and pay them the surplus revenue.<sup>2</sup>

The change of dynasty was marked by a change of residence. The Omayyad governors had generally lived at Fustāt, though two had temporarily removed the seat of government to Alexandria, leaving a deputy at Fusṭāt. The 'Abbāsid governors built a new official capital (a military suburb rather than a city) at a place called el-Hamrā el-Kuṣwā ("the further red way") on the plain to the north-east of Fustāt, where the soldiers of some of the

<sup>1</sup> Under the Omayyads there were thirty-one changes of governors in 209 years; under the 'Abbāsids, sixty-seven in 118 years.

<sup>2</sup> These fiefs were Ashnās, 837—844; Itāk, 845—849; el-Mintasir 850—856, el-Faib, 856—868, Buṣluk, 868, Burgāq, 869—872, el-Muwaffaq, 872.

Arab tribes had formerly built houses of defence, whence the place was known as el-'Askar, "the army." Salih, the 'Abbasid general, camped there in 730; his lieutenant, Abu-'Awn, built houses there; and el-'Askar became the official residence of the governor, his guard, and ministers.<sup>1</sup> Suburbs connected it with Fustat, from which the Nile had already (by 725) retreated some little distance westward. Another palace, called the Kubbat-el-Hawa ("Dome of the Air"), was built in 809-810 by the governor Ilatim on the spur of the Mukattam hills, where the Citadel of Cairo now stands, and here the governors often resorted for the cool breezes.

The period of the government of Egypt under the 'Abbasid caliphs of Baghdad was distracted by frequent insurrections. These were due less to the Copts (who joined in, rather than caused rebellion) than to the Muslims themselves. There were already serious schisms in Islam. Not to speak of the slight differences of the four orthodox schools of theology—of which the Maliki or school founded on the teaching of the great divine Malik, was most widely followed in Egypt from the eighth to the tenth century, though after the coming of the Imām esh-Shāfi'i to Fustat, at the beginning of the ninth century, the Shāfi'is began gradually to acquire the predominance which they still enjoy in Egypt—the bitter enmity between the Shi'a and the Sunnis, between the upholders of the divine right of 'Ali's family to the caliphate and the defenders of the caliphate actually in power, already divided the Muslims. The supporters of the claim of 'Ali's descendants to the caliphate, and the Khārigis (or "revolters"), a sect of puritans who had a large share in the downfall of 'Ali himself, were strongly represented in Egypt, and the Arab tribes who had been imported into the Hawf were continually in a state of rebellion. In 754 Abu-'Awn, Salih's general, who had been campaigning against the Berbers in Barṣa, was obliged to return to put down a great rising of the Khārīgis in Egypt, and the result was the despatch of 3000 rebels' heads to Fustat. In 739 there was another campaign in Barka, where the Khārīgis had made common cause with the Berbers and the supporters of the late Omawiyad dynasty and the Egyptian army was defeated. The next governor, Huneyd, who brought 20,000 men with him, and was shortly further reinforced, carried on the war, and after some reverses succeeded in beating the rebels and killing the Khārīgi leader. The 'Alawis or 'Alids, adherents of 'Ali's faction, next came on the scene, and one of the family ('Ali b. Mohammad b. 'Abdallāh) was near becoming caliph in Egypt, till the 'Abbāsid caliph el-Mansūr, after catching and killing another rebel of the family at Basra adopted the determining expedient of sending the victim's head to be exposed in the mosque at Fustat which so daunted the 'Alids that the movement collapsed. So serious was the ferment, however, that Yezid b. Hātim, the governor, forbade the annual pilgrimage to Mekka in 764. In the following year he had to suppress a Khārīgi insurrection in Abyssinia, and as a reward for his services the province of Barka was in 766 for the first time joined to his government of Egypt.

<sup>1</sup> Maqr. i. 304. El-'Askar decayed after Salih's departure, but was restored and enlarged by Muhibb b. 'Isā el-Abīn four years later. Cf. Lane, Cairo fifty years ago, 7 ff.

Fig. 6.—Glass weight of Yezid b. Hātim [761].

It was now the turn of the Copts. They had already twice risen at Semennūd in the delta, and in 767 they rebelled at Sakhā, twice defeated the governor's troops, and drove out the tax gatherers. A considerable district of Lower Egypt was in open insurrection, and was not restored to order until several years later. The result was naturally more stringent suppression and persecution. Tranquillity was restored for a while under the gentle rule of Muṣṭil b. Olayy, who treated the people with benevolence, and delighted in discoursing in the mosque and reciting the prayers, for he was a noted divine. A violent alternative was supplied in 779 by Abu Salih,<sup>77</sup> known as Ibn-Mendud, the first governor who came of Turkish race, a most capable and energetic ruler, but stern and severe.

Fig. 2.—Glass weight of Mohammed b. Sa'id (769). He found the roads infested by robbers of the Kays Arabs of the Hawf, and immediately put a stop to their exploits by summary executions. It was his theory that under his sway thieving could not exist, and he therefore issued orders that all gates and house-doors, and even taverns, should be left open at night. People used to stretch nets before their open doors to keep the dogs out. He interdicted the employment of watchmen at the public baths, and announced that if anything were stolen he would replace it out of his own pocket. When any one went to the bath, he would lay down his garments in the dressing-room and call out, "O Abu-Salih, take care of my clothes!" and would then go and bathe in perfect confidence that when he came out no one would have dared to touch them. But Ibn-Mendud's severity caused more fear than it alayed, and his ridiculous sumptuary laws, prescribing special head-dresses for judges and other officials, and his constant interference, so harassed the people that his dismissal was universally applauded.

A grave political rebellion occurred in 782 in the Sa'id,<sup>78</sup> where Dihya b. Mur'ab, the Orsayyad proclaimed himself caliph. Most of Upper Egypt joined his faction, and the government troops were repulsed. A new governor was sent out, who first mulcted his unsuccessful predecessor in the sum of 350,000 D. for his failure to suppress the revolt, and then adopted the strange method of ingratiating his rule with the people by doubling the land-tax, and imposing fresh duties on markets and beasts of burthen. Muṣṭa thus made himself so generally detested that even his own soldiers deserted. The Arab tribes in the Hawf seized the opportunity to take up arms again, and the governor was defeated and killed. His successor was not more fortunate. He failed to reduce the rebels in the Sa'īd, but the campaign was memorable for a curious incident. The governor's brother chalchallenged the rebel general to single combat, each ran the other through, both died, and the two armies fled from each other in panic. It was not till el-Faidl, the son of Salih, the 'Abbāsid conqueror of Egypt, took the matter in hand, that this wide-spread rebellion was put down. El-Faidl tried no half-measures, but brought a loyal army from Syria, which gained a series of victories in the Sa'īd, and captured the pretender. Dihya was executed at Fusṭāt, his body crucified and his head sent to the caliph at Baghdad.

Fig. 8.—Glass weight of el-Faidl b. Salih (785).

Unfortunately el-Faidl grew so puffed up by his triumph that he had to be removed, and his nephew, who succeeded, though a just man and benevolent (save towards the Copts, whose churches he demolished), following in his ambitious steps received a similar recall from Hārūn er-Rashid. Both these men were members of the 'Abbāsid family, and were consequently disposed to cherish dreams of election to the caliphate, which was not so entailed that er-Rashid could afford to despise them. The same ambition was discovered in the next <sup>791</sup> governor, Muṣṭa b. 'Isa the 'Abbāsid, a man of great official experience, and well disposed towards the Copts, whom he allowed to rebuild their ruined churches.

When it was reported that he was harbouring designs against the caliph, Hārūn exclaimed, with his usual levity, "By Allah, I wil. depose him, and in his place I will set the meanest creature of my court." Just then 'Omar, the secretary of the caliph's mother, came riding on his mule. "Will you be governor of Egypt?" asked G'afar the Rammecide. "Oh, yes," said 'Omar. No sooner said than done : 'Omar rode his mule to Fustat, followed by a single slave carrying his baggage. Entering the governor's house, he took his seat in the back row of the assembled court. Muṣṭafā, not knowing him, asked his business, whereat 'Omar presented him with the caliph's despatch. On reading it Muṣṭafā exclaimed, in Koranic phrase, "God curse Pharaoh, who said 'Am I not king of Egypt?'" and forthwith delivered up the government to "the meanest creature." The story is too like one of Hārūn's practical jokes to be quite disbelieved, and it is at least certain that Muṣṭafā retired in 792.

During these changes of government, the Arabs of the Hawf pursued their career of insubord nation. In 802 and 803 there was severe fighting ; the nomads refused to pay taxes, plundered travelers, lifted cattle, and made raids into Palestine, with the support of the frontier Arabs. A treacherous decoy of some of their chiefs in 807 checked them for the moment, but the contest for the caliphate, which arose on Hārūn's death in 808, between his sons, el-Amin and el-Ma'mūn, divided the allegiance of the Egyptians, and led to fresh outbreaks in the Hawf. The two claimants appointed rival governors, and el-Amin shrewdly nominated the chief of the Kays Arabs to the office, thus securing the support of the party most disaffected to the government. El-Ma'mūn's representative was accordingly defeated and killed.

To this official recognition the Arabs of the Hawf now added a new source of strength by the arrival in Alexandria in 798 of over 15,000 Andalusians, besides women and children. These refugees had been banished from Spain by the Omayyad prince el-Hakam, in consequence of a rebellion at Cordova, which had gone near to overthrowing his monarchy.<sup>1</sup> They were allowed to land, but not to enter Alexandria, and they supported themselves as best they could by sea commerce. They soon became a factor in the political situation, and having leagued themselves with the powerful Arab tribe of Lakhm, seized Alexandria in 815. Here they fought and treated alternately with the government and with malcontents of the Hāšimī, until at last the task of suppressing the obnoxious colony was placed in the hands of a strong man. The caliph el Māmūn sent 'Abdallāh the son of Tāhir, one of the most famous generals of the age, to Egypt in 826, with an army officered by trusty veterans from Khurāṣān. A siege of fourteen days brought Alexandria to terms, in 827, and the Andalusians agreed to embark on their ships, taking every soul belonging to them free and slave, woman and child, on pain of death. They sailed away to Crete, where they settled and ruled till the eastern emperor recovered the island in 661.

<sup>2,3</sup> Ibn-Tāhir had undertaken a difficult task. Before exiling the Andalusians he had fought the governor, 'Obeydallāh b. es-Sari, who refused to accept his dismissal until Ibn-Tāhir had starved him out of Fustāṭ. As a last hope, he sent his besieger in the dead of night an offering of a thousand slaves and slave-girls, each carrying a thousand dinārī in a silk purse; but Ibn-Tāhir sent them back, saying "I would not accept your gifts by day, still less by night." After the surrender of Fustāṭ, and the expulsion of the Andalusians from Alexandria, the successful general, whom the caliph had prophetically named "Victorious" (el-Mansūr), restored order throughout the country, reorganized the army, and made Egypt loyal once more. In return for his great services, the caliph allowed him to enjoy the full revenue of Egypt, amounting to 3,000,000 D.<sup>2</sup> He is described as a just and

<sup>1</sup> Dozy, Hist. des Musulmans d'Espagne, II. 68-76; Quatremère, Histoire de l'Egypte, i.

<sup>2</sup> 3,000,000 D. cannot be the gross revenue, but it might be the amount derived from the land-tax. But as it appears that the land-tax about this time reached the sum of 4,857,000 D., it is more probable humane governor, a man of learning, and a staunch friend to poets, of whom several were always in his train. His name has been preserved in the 'Abdallāwi melons of Egypt, a variety which he specially introduced.

The brief rest which the land enjoyed under his strong and judicious rule was broken upon his departure for his own province of Khurāsān, in the north-east of Persia. The Arabs of the Hawf speedily renewed their outrages, and advancing close to the capital, at Mātariya, defeated the new governor, who burned his baggage and took refuge behind the walls of Fustāt. When al-Mo'tażī, brother of the caliph, and afterwards caliph himself, came to the rescue with 4000 Turkish troops, he found the city blockaded by the Arabs; and though he dispersed them (819) and killed their chief, as soon as he had returned to Baghdad, five months later (driving a crowd of wretched barefoot prisoners before his savage troopers), the insurrection broke out afresh, and spread among the Copts; and at last the caliph resolved to go to Egypt in person.

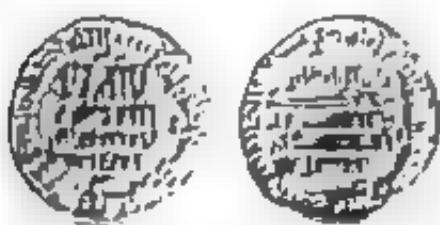

Fig. 9.—Dinār (gold coin) of caliph el-Ma'mūn, struck at Mātariya (Fustāt), 814.

It was the first time that an 'Abbāsī caliph had visited the Nile, the praises of which poets had constantly been dinging in his ears; and when el-Ma'mūn surveyed the view from the "Dome of the Air," he was frankly disappointed. "God curse Pharaoh," he cried, "for saying, 'Am I not king of Egypt?'"<sup>1</sup> If only he had seen 'Irāq and its meadows!" "Say not so," replied a divine, "for it is also written, 'We have brought to nought what Pharaoh and his folk reared and built so skilfully',"<sup>2</sup> and what must have been those things which God that the 3,000,000 D represents the excess of revenue over the cost of administration—the surplus (after paying the army, officials, etc.) which would in the ordinary course have been sent to the caliph.

<sup>1</sup> Kordé, xlvi. 50.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. vii. 133.

destroyed, if these are but their remnants!" The caliph then disgraced the ineffective governor, beheaded a leader of the revolt, and sent an army under the Turk Afshin into the Hawf, where the rebellious Copts were massacred in cold blood, their villages burnt, and their wives and children sold as slaves. This stern repression broke the spirit of the Copts, and we hear no more of national movements. Many of them apostatized to Islam, and from this date begins the numerical preponderance of the Muslims over the Christians in Egypt, and the settlement of the Arabs in the villages and on the land, instead of as heretofore only in the great cities. Egypt now became, for the first time, an essentially Mohammedan country.

Meanwhile, the caliph had visited Alexandria and Sakhā: there is also a legend, resting on no early authority, that he attempted to open the great pyramid of Gīza in search of treasure, but gave it up on finding that his workmen could make no perceptible impression on the vast mass.<sup>1</sup> After over a month's stay, el-Māmūn returned to Baghdad. He left the country in a state of peace, which, save for a brief outbreak among the Lakhtmi Arabs of the delta, was not disturbed for many years.

Whatever dissensions arose were caused by theological differences among the Muslims themselves. El-Māmūn's enforcement of the doctrine of the createdness of the Korān, as a test without which no kāfi or judge could be enrolled, produced more heart-burning than the subject seems to merit. A chief kāfi, who would not conform to the established doctrine, was shorn of his beard, whipped, and driven through the city on an ass. His

Fig. 10.—Glass weight of Ashnas [834 fl.]

1 Cf. 'Abd-el-Latif, 176, and de Sacy's note, 219; Wüstenfeld, Staatsalter, 43 n.

successor continued to scourge him at the rate of twenty cuts a day, till he extorted the desired ibhishish. Followers of the (orthodox) sects of the Imaüs and Shaüüs were driven out of the mo-que. A suspicious slip in reading the Koran brought a flogging.

A similar system of petty interference vexed the Copts a little later. A series of new regulations of the caliph el-Mutawekkil was promulgated throughout the provinces of Egypt in 850. The Christians were ordered to wear honey-coloured clothes, with distinguishing patches, use wooden stirrups and set up wooden images of the devil or an ape or dog over their doors; the girdle, the symbol of femininity, was forbidden to women, and ordered to be worn by men; crosses must not be shown nor processional lights carried in the streets, and their graves must be indistinguishable from the earth around. They were also forbidden to ride horses. Such childish persecution could only be designed to furnish occasion for disobedience, and thus for fines and extortion.

The independent spirit of the kadi, who was whipped for non-compliance with superior orders, was typical of his class and office. In a period of grasping governors and extortionate treasurers, when corruption and injustice prevailed throughout the administration, the chief kadi, or lord chancellor and primate of Egypt, could almost always be trusted to maintain the sacred law, despite threats and bribes. The law may have been narrow, and the kadi a bigot, but he was at least a man of some education, trained in Mohammadan jurisprudence, and generally of high character and personal rectitude. So important was his office and so great his influence that when other ministers were changed with the rapid succession of governors, the kadi frequently remained in office for a series of administrations, and even when deposed he would often be restored by a later governor or caliph. Sooner than submit to any interference with his legal judgments, he would resign his post, and so beloved were many of the kadis that a governor would think twice before he risked the unpopularity which would follow any meddling with their jurisdiction. Indeed in 'Abbāsid times he had scarcely the power to dismiss them, for from the time of Ibn Lāhi'a, who was appointed Kādi by the caliph el-Manṣūr in 751-2, the nomination to the office seems generally to have been made at Baghdaid, and the salary fixed, if not paid by the caliph. The salary of Ibn-Lāhi'a was 30 dinārs a month, but in 327 'Isāb el-Munkādir received monthly 4000 dirhems (or 300 D.), and a fee of 1000 D. Kādi Ghauth (†747) was a model of uprightness, and accessible to any petition, every new moon he attended public sittings with the lawyers. His successor, el-Mutaddīl, also bore a very high character, and he was the first to insist on the necessary reform of keeping full records of causes. It was a laborious office, demanding besides judicial sessions the regulation of the religious festivals, keeping the calendar, often preaching in the mosque, and other duties, so that we read of several men refusing a post which taxed their energy and probity so severely. Abū-Khuzeyma accepted it only after the governor had sent for the executioner's axe and block. This kādi had been a rope-maker, and one day when on the bench he was asked by an old acquaintance for a halter, whereupon the good man fetched one from his house, and then went on with the case before the court. The combination of extreme simplicity and benevolence with a firm and dignified maintenance of the law of Islām procured him vast popularity.

<sup>13</sup> The last Arab governor of Egypt, 'Anbasa, was the best of them all—a strong, just man who held a tight hand over his officials, and showed his subjects such goodwill as they had not known before. Unostentatious, he always went on foot from the government house at el-'Askar to the mosque, strict in his religious duties, he never failed to observe the fast of Rāmādān in all its rigour. He was not only the last governor of Arab blood; he was also the last to take his place in the mosque as leader of the prayers, which was the duty of governors in the absence of the caliph, the supreme head of religion. 'Anbasa's tenure of office was memorable for two invasions of Egypt from opposite ends. In May, 853, whilst the governor was celebrating the Feast of Sacrifice (10th Dhu-l-Hijja) at Fustat, for the due observance of which he had ordered up most of the troops in garrison from Damietta and Tunis, and even from Alexandria, to take part in a grand review, the news arrived that the Romans were raiding the coast. They found Damietta deserted, and burned it, making prisoners of 600 women and children. By the time 'Anbasā reached the city they were off by sea to Tunis, and when he pursued, they had sailed home. As a precaution against similar surprises a fort was built to guard the approach to Damietta—as the Crusaders long afterwards discovered to their cost—and Tunis was similarly strengthened.

The other attack came from the Sūdān. In 854 the Bagāl people of Nubia and the eastern desert repudiated the annual tribute, consisting of four hundred male and female slaves, a number of camels, two elephants, and two giraffes, which they had been compelled to send to Egypt ever since the campaign of 652. They put to the sword the Egyptian officers and miners in the Emerald mountains, and then falling upon the Ḫaḍīd, plundered Esnē, Edfū and other places and sent the inhabitants flying north in a panic. This was a formidable affair, and 'Anbasā wrote to the caliph at Baghdad for instructions. In spite of the alarming accounts given him by several travellers as to the wildness of the country and the ferocity of the Bagāls, the caliph el-Mutawakkil decided to bring them to order. Great preparations were made in Egypt; quantities of stores, weapons, horses and camels were collected, and troops assembled, at Kūfī, Esnē, Erment, Aswan, on the Nile, and Kuseyr on the Red Sea. Seven ships laden with stores sailed from Kulkum to Ṣangū near 'Aydhāb at that time the chief port on the African coast of the Red Sea. The marshal, Mohammad of Kumm, marched from Kūfī with 7000 soldiers, crossed the desert to the emerald mines, and even approached Dongola. The news of his advance spread over the Sūdān, and 'Ali Rābā, its king, collected a vast army to resist him. Fortunately for the Muslims these Sudánis, instead of wearing mail, were completely naked, and armed only with short spears, whilst their camels were ill-trained and unmanageable, as is the manner of their kind. When they saw the weapons and horses of the Arabs, they understood that they would have no chance against them in a set battle; but by manoeuvring and skirmishing from place to place they hoped to wear out the enemy and exhaust their provisions. In this they had nearly succeeded, when the seven ships from Kulzum appeared off the coast. To cut off the Arabs from their supplies, the Sudánis were forced to attack at all costs. The Arab general, however, had hung camel-bells on the necks of his horses, and let the blacks come up till they were almost at spear length; then, with a great shout of "Alláhu Akbar," he ordered a general charge, amid a deafening din of bells and drums, which so terrified the enemy's camels that they threw their riders and turned tail in a stampede. The plain was strewn with corpses, and 'Ali Baba, who escaped, was glad to make peace and pay the arrears of tribute. The Muslim leader received him honourably, seated him on his own carpet, made him handsome presents, and induced him not only to pay a visit to Fustat, but even to go and see the caliph at Baghdad. To the credit of the Muslims he was allowed to return in safety to his own people.<sup>1</sup>

After four years of good government and valiant service, 'Anbarsa was recalled, and a series of Turkish governors misruled the country. Disliking the Arabs with the hatred of race, and supported by a decree of the caliph el-Musta'in, they favoured the Copts, restored many of their confiscated lands and possessions, and permitted the rebuilding of their churches. To the Arabs they were intolerable, and the Muslims were the victims of their eccentricities. One of them, Yezid, entertained a strong aversion to eunuchs, and had them flogged out of the town; he also disliked the weird sound of the women's wailing at funerals, and objected to horse-racing. In his government the second Kilometer at Kûda was founded, and the charge of measuring the rise of the Nile was taken away from the Copts, who had always fulfilled it. He possessed an evil genius in his finance minister, Ibn-Nâdebbâr, who invented new taxes, and besides the Khârâq (land-tax) and Ahâlî (monthly duties on shops and trades, etc.), established government monopolies in the natron mines and the fisheries, and imposed taxes on fodder and on wine-shops. The usual disturbances followed; first a rising at Alexandria, then in the Hawf, scarcely put down before another occurred at Gîza, and a fourth in the Fayyâm. The whole country fell into disorder, much bloodshed ensued, many were cast into prison, and the people were cruelly and fantastically oppressed. Women were straitly ordered to keep to their houses; they could not even visit the graves or go to the bath. Public performers and the professional keening women were imprisoned. No one might even say "In God's name" aloud in the mosque—a test point in orthodoxy—or deviate an inch from the orderly rows of the worshippers. A Turk stood by with a whip to marshal the congregation and keep the ranks, like a sergeant. A number of irksome rules and changes in rites and customs exasperated the people. At last a Turk came who knew how to govern. His name was Ahmed ibn Tâlis, and he and his dynasty demand a separate chapter.

<sup>1</sup> Ibn-Miskawayh, ed. de Goeje, 350 ff.

The following tables give the lists of the caliphs and governors, together with the heads of the departments of war (marshal), finance (treasurer), and justice (chief kâdî). The list of ministers is doubtless incomplete; but a good many of the gaps are explained by the fact that a governor was often his own finance minister, and sometimes marshal as well. The genealogical complication of the names is necessary for identification, and the tribal names (as el-Bageli, el-Kelbi, el-Azdi) are interesting as showing their origin. It will be noticed that there was evidently a species of official class, for the same names, or the same families, often recur, and the man who was marshal might become in turn kādī or governor. Some of the governors' and treasurers' names occur on coins, and on the glass weights and stamps impressed on measures of capacity, which are apparently peculiar to Egypt, and of which many examples have been published from the British Museum, the Khedivial Library, and Dr. Fouquet's fine collection at Cairo.

GOVERNORS OF EGYPT

45

GOVERNORS OF EGYPT

I. UNDER EARLY CALIFORNIA

CALIPH	GOVERNOR	WAR	PLANE	JUSTICE
632 Abū-Bekr
634 'Umar	640 'Amr b. cl-'Asī	Khārija b. Huzayfa	'Othmān b. Kays	Oklā b. 'Amāt cl-Ghālini
		Es-Sābi b. Ilyshām	Su'aym b. Hr rl-Jugjās
644 'Othmān	644 'Abdullah b. Sād
646 'Ali	656 Keys b. Sa'd
	657 g Mohamed b. Abī-Bekr
	[Mālik b. cl-Ilāith cl-Ashər]

III. UNDER ONE YARD CANTER

658	'Amr b. al-'As <sup>b</sup>	Sūyah b. 'Uyaynah	Khārijah b. Jūnah al-As'afī	"Medallists", Pers. lx. c. 1500
664	'Abdullah b. 'Amr	-	-	-
664	Otba b. Abi-Sufyan <sup>c</sup>	Zo'miyah b. Hudayyib	-	-

<sup>1</sup> Brother of the caliph Mo'swiya. Talafī makes 'Abdullah succeed his father 'Amr in 664 and govern Egypt till 667 (A.I.L. 47), when he was replaced by Motawiyah b. Ilucay‡ (47-50), who was followed by Maslamah in 670 (50, Pal., ii. 93, 94); thus recognising Qays and 'Ukba; 'Abdullah and Abu'l-Mahasin adopted

GOVERNORS OF EGYPT

II. UNDER OMAYYAD CALIPHS (continued)

CALIPH	GOVERNOR	WAR	FINANCE	JUSTICE	VICE-GOVERNOR
661 Mo'swya	665 'Oktā b. 'Amir el- G'ubeni
	667 Muṣlima b. Mu-	Es-Sālib b. Hishām	Es-Sālib b. Hishām	Es-Sālib b.	Hishām
680 Yezid ['Abdallāh b. Zubayr]	682 Sa'īd b. Yezid el- Khālid	'Abīt Azdi		'Abīt
683 Marwās	684 'Abd-er-Rahmān b. 'Utbah b. Qāj-	'Abd-er-Rahmān b. 'Utbah b. Qāj-	"	" dam el-Kurashī
685 'Abd-el-'Aqīz b. Marwan <sup>1</sup>	686 'Amr b. Sa'id			Rashīt b. 'An-Naqd <sup>2</sup>
693 'Abd-el-Mellik				'Abd-er-Kālīmūn b. Huṣayra el-Kawāfi	'Abd-er-Rahmān b. Ḥuṣayra
					Mālik b. Shariṭ <sup>3</sup>
					Yūnus b. 'Atīya <sup>4</sup>
					'Abd-er-Kālīmūn b. Mo'swya
					b. Mo'swya b. Hindiyā <sup>5</sup>
					'Imrān b. 'Abd-er- Kālīmūn b. Shurāfi <sup>6</sup>

this version. Tabard, however, is singularly defective in his scanty notices of Egyptian governors, and the same remark applies to his follower, Ibu-el Athir.

<sup>1</sup> Brother of the caliph 'Abd el-Mellik
<sup>2</sup> Son of the caliph.

GOVERNORS OF EGYPT

II. UNDER OMAYYAD CALIPHS (continued)

CALIPH	GOVERNOR	WAR	FINANCE	JUSTICE	VICE-GOVERNOR
705 El-Welid				*'Abd el-Ala b. Khalid 'Abdullah b.'Abd- er-Rahman b. Huqayra
709 Mu'arrab b. Shank	'Abd el-'Aru b. Khalid
714 'Abd el-Mellik b. Raqq'a el-Bekri	El-Welid b. Rifa'a *Osama b. 'Izyd				Ibn-Huqayra (again)
715 Sulayman
717 'Omar b. 'Abd-el-'Aziz	717 Ayyub b. Shurah- bil el-Ashrah	El-Hasan b. Yezid ?Hayyib			Shu- reyb
720 Yezid II.	720 Dushr b. 'Asafwan	Shu'reyb b. el-Ja- bir
721 Hanzaba b. Saf- wan el-Fihri	"	"
724 Hisam	724 Muhammad b. 'Abd el-Mekk b. Marwan	Uqash b. el-Welid

<sup>1</sup> A glass stamp (for a measure of capacity) in the Fouquet Coll., with the governor's name, is published by Casanova in Mem. de la Mus. archéol. du Caire, vi, p. 367.
<sup>2</sup> Glass weights of Osama are in the British Museum (Lane-Poole, Catalogue of Arabic Glass Weights in the B.M., No. a) and Fouquet Coll. Osama b. Zeek is mentioned as governing Egypt in A.H. 102 (720-1) by Ishaq el-Ahmar, v. 27; but other historians do not give his name in that year.

<sup>3</sup> Glass weights of this treasurer are in B.M. and Fouquet.

<sup>4</sup> Several glass weights and stamps of this treasurer in B.M. and Fouquet; one dated A.H. 111 = 729 (see Catalog. B.M., p. 108).

II. UNDER OMAYYAD CALIPHS (continued)

CALIPH	GOVERNOR	WAR	FINANCE	JUSTICE	VICE-GOVERNOR
724 Hishām	724 El-Jurr b. Wāṣif	Ḥaṣṣ b. el-Welid	‘Olleydālāh b. el- Ḥaṣṣābī	Yahyā b. Muyāmīn	Ḥaṣṣ b. el-Welid
			"	"	"
727 Ḥaṣṣ b. el-Welid el-Ḥadramī
727 ‘Abd-el-Melik b. Riḥāb dīs			"	"
727 El-Welid b. Rūfīs el-Fehmī	‘Abdallāh b. Su- mays el-Fehmī ‘Alīzīr-Ranīmīn A. Khalid el- Fehmī		"		El-Klijāb b. Khlā- bi
735 ‘Alīd or Rahmān b. Khalid el- Fehmī		‘Abdallāh b. Besb- shār el-Fehmī			"
737 Ḥandhala b. Suf- wan dīs		‘Iyādh b. Hayyāma el-Kelbī	‘Uṣaydālāh b. el-Ḥabībī	"
742 Ḥaṣṣ b. el-Welid bīx		‘Oqlā b. No’eym or Ro’eym		Xheyr b. No’eym	Kheyr ‘Uqlā b. No’eym
				"
El-Welid II

<sup>1</sup> Makr gives his date A.H. 114-116; but glass weights and stamps in the R.M. (no. 4) and Fouquet Coll. bear dates 149 and 122=737 and 740.

<sup>2</sup> Glass statuary and weights of Hafṣ have been published (B.M. Catalogue, and Casanova, Collection Fouquet).

III UNDER OMAYYAD CALIFTS (continued)

CALIPH	GOVERNOR	WAH	PT. WAH	J. TURK	VICE-GOVERNOR
744 Yezid III. 744 Ibrâhîm
744 Marwân II.	745 Hâssân b. 'Afiyya et-Tugîlî	745 b. Maîn'atâ Khayr b. Nu'ayyâ
	745 Hâr b. el-Wellî fer
	745 El-Hawâthara b. Suhayl el-Kâthîlî
	749 El-Mughîra b. 'Obeydallâh el- Fazâ'î	749 Abdallâh b. el- Mughîra
750 ? 'Abd-el-Melik b. Marwân I.	'Abd-el-Melik b. Marwân I. Lakhmî	'Abd-el-Melik b. Marwân Iudeyyg Marwân b. Marwân and at Cairo; some bearing the mint names Miar and I-Fustar or opposite sides, and one Miar and I-fisken-darya (?) (Alexandria). Lane-Pole, Cat. Ar. Coins in Abyssin. Coll. pl. II, p. 115.

<sup>1</sup> Glass stamps and weights of these officials have been published (B.M. Catalogue, and Casanova, Cofferton Fountaine).
<sup>2</sup> Besides glass weights and stamps of Abd-e-Melik b. Marwan, there are coins bearing his name in the B.M.

GOVERNORS OF EGYPT

III. UNDER ABBASID CALIPHS

CALIPH	GOVERNOR	WAR	FINANCES	JURISD.	VIC & GOVERNOR
750 Es-Saffāh	750 'Salīb b. 'Alī el-'Abdāsī	'Yezīl b. Hāmī	'Abd-er-Rahmān b. 'Uthmān	Kheyf b. Nūtaym
	751 Abū-'Awn 'Abd-el-Melik	'Ikrima b. 'Abd-al-Lāh	'Ata b. Shurāth	Ghawth b. Sātaymān
	753 'Zādī b. 'Alī bīj	bīj	bīj	bīj	'El-Kāfi b. Shālikh b. 'Alī
754 El-Manṣūr	754 Alī b. 'Awān bīj	"	I Nawī <sup>1</sup> b. cl-	Wā' Khuzayma	Khālid b. Hābilb
	758 'Mūsā b. Kā'b a'	"	Fuqāl	"	"
	759 'Muhammad b. el-	1 El Muhibbī b.	"	"
	Ashy'āt el-Khu	'Uthmān	"	"
	760 'Umarīyād b. Kalb-	Mohammad b.			Muhammad b.
	Ishāb el-'Uṣūl	Mu'āwiya	"	"	Mu'āwiya
	762 'Umarīd b. Hātil	" Abdallāh b. 'Abd-	Ghawth
	Muhallem	er-Rashīdī b.	Al-'
		Hāceyyg	Marwān

<sup>1</sup> Glass stamps and weights of these officials have been published (B.M. Catalogue, and Casanova, Collection Foreign).

<sup>2</sup> 'Uzīl b. Hāmī was matched at el-'Asfar, 'Uzīma at al-Fustat.

GOVERNORS OF EGYPT

51

III. UNDER 'ABRBASID CALIPHS (continued)

CALIPH	GOVERNOR	WAR	FINANCE	JUSTICE	VICE-GOVERNOR
754 El-Mansur	769 'Abdullah b. 'Abd-			Abū Khureyyra	Muhammad b.
	er-Rahmān b.				'Abd-er-Rah-
	Mu'āwiya b.				mān b. Iudeyā <sup>1</sup>
	Il-Walid <sup>2</sup>
					'Abdullah b. Lathā <sup>3</sup>
					"
772 Muhammed b.	El-'Abbas b. 'Abd-
	'Abd-er-Rahmān
772 Muṣā b. 'Ubayy el-	Abū-Sahl <sup>4</sup>				"
	Lakhmī
775 El-Mahdi	778 'Isā b. Lukman	Muṣā b. Zayd <sup>5</sup>
	779 Wadīḥ	Hashim b. 'Abd-
	779 Maṇīṭ b. Yezid	allāh
	er-Ro'eyni	"Ald-er-'Alī b.
		Sa'd
	779 Abū-Sahl Yahyā (Ibn-Merindū)	Assāma b. 'Amr <sup>6</sup>
	780 Sālim b. Sawāda	El-Akhdar b. Mar-	Abū Kaitib
	er-Tamīni	wān	Ismā'il
	781 Ibrāhīm b. Sa'līḥ b.	Assāma b. 'Amr	Ghādīth
	'All b. 'Abdāsī		"

<sup>1</sup> Glass stamps and weights of these officials have been published (B. M., Catalogue and Collection Parquée).

<sup>2</sup> A coin of Ibrāhīm dated Mar. 167=733-4 A.D. is published (Cat. Cairo, 86); also a weight and stamp (B. M., Parquée).

GOVERNORS OF EGYPT

III. UNDER 'ABBAŚID CALIFFS (continued)

CALIFF	GOVERNOR	WAX	PLATE	JUSTICE	VICE-GOVERNOR
775 El-Mahdi	784 Mūsā b. 'Uṣayḥ 785 'Asdām b. 'Amr	'Assāma b. 'Amr	Għawwix I'l-Muṣaqħat	I.
785 'El-Fadl b. Sahl b. Ali el-'Abbasi		"	Fudāla Abū-Tāħur el-Azraq
785 El-Mādī	786 'Ali b. Suleymān b. Aliet 'Abbasi	'Abde-Rahman b. Mu'ād F.-Hasan b. 'Uzayr Ismā'il b. 'Isā	"
786 El-Rashīd	787 Mūsā b. 'Isā el- 'Abbasi	'Assāma b. 'Amr 'Abd er-Raġib b. Maħħama	"
	789 Mūsā b. Vahyā el-Kāfi	Habib b. Alām	Omar b. Ħanq Ibn	"
	789 Muhammād b. Zuhayr el-Azraq	'Ammār b. Muāsim	Habib b. Sālib	"
	790 Dawid b. Yezid b. Hātim el-Mu ħadiebī			I'l-Muṣaqħat	I.
	791 Mūsā b. 'Isā el- 'Abbasi bis	Nayr b. 'Isā Ibn 'Uqba	I'l-Muṣaqħat	"
	792 Ibrāhīm b. Shalib el-'Abbasi bis	Khalil b. 'Uzayr	"		'Assāma b. 'Amr Ilgħad

* Glass stamps and weights of these officials have been published (B.M. Catalogue, and Collection Farnese).

GOVERNORS OF EGYPT

III. UNDER 'AMBASSID CALIPHS (continued)

NAME	GOVERNOR	WAR	FINANCE	JUSTICE	VICE-GOVERNOR
785 El-Rashid	793 'Abdullah b. el-Mas'ūd	Abū-Makīs
	793 Isḥāq b. Suleyman <sup>a</sup>	Muslim b. Bekīr el-Qayyūf
	b. 'Abd el-'Uzzāf
	794 'Abd al-Malik b. Sālih b. 'Abī el- 'Alīkāi (non- resident)	Northam b. A'yan		"
	795 'Obeydallāh b. el- Mahdī b. 'Abū- lāsi	Muṣṭawya b. Ṣurad		"
	796 Muṣṭafā b. 'Isā el- 'Abdāsi b. 'U-	'Ammār b. Muslim		"
	b.
	796 'Obeydallāh b. el- Mahdī b.	Suleyman b. 'U-		"
	797 Iṣmā'īl b. Sālih b. 'Alī el-'Alīkāi	Suleyman b. 'U-		"
	798 Iṣmā'īl b. 'Isfān Muṣṭafā b. 'Alīkāi	Suleyman b. 'U-		"
	799 El-Layl b. 'Abd-Faqī	'Alī b. el-Faqī	Malīku b. 'Isā Suleyman	Iṣlāḥ b. el-Yurāt "	"Allī b. el-Faqī

<sup>a</sup> A weight of Ismā'īl in B.M. (Cat. 23), but of the time when he was magistrate of Egypt under the caliph el-Mahdi.

GOVERNORS OF EGYPT

III UNDER ABBASID CALIPHS (continued)

CALIPH	GOVERNOR	WAR	FINANCE	JUSTICE	VIC W-GOVERNOR
786 Fr. Rashid
803 Ahmad b. Ishaq b. 'Aliel (Abbas)	Mo'twīya b. Shurad			'Abd-el-Rahmān b. 'Abd-Allāh	Hāshim b. 'Abd-
805 'Obeydallāh (Ibn-Zeyneb) b. 'Abd-	Aḥmad b. Mūsā			b. 'Abd-Allāh	al-Ālāh bāl
	Mohammad b.
	'Assūna
806 El Huseyn b. Gemil	El-Kānit et-Iltnā'ī
807 Malik b. Delhem	Mohammad b. Tuhā et-Kellī
809 El-Hasan b. Takhīlah	Mohammad b. Ghādī Muhammad b. Ziyād				Rāfi' b. Wahb
809 El-Amīn	Salih b. 'Abd-el-Kerim
	Suleyman b. Ghālib
	'Ali b. el-Muthannā
810 Mu'āim b. Harthama b. A'yan	'Obeydallāh b. Turūsi
812 Gālib b. el-Ash'rāt et-Tā'i	Ibrāhim b. Ilekka

III. UNDER 'ABBASID CALIPHS (continued)

CALIPH	GOVERNOR	WAX	FINANCE	JUSTICE	VICE-GOVERNOR
809 El-Amin	812 'Abbad b. Balkhi	I'lubeyrah, I'lushim b. I'ludayyib			Lahfa b. 'Umar
813 El-Ma'mun	813 'El-Mutallib b. Khuzay'i	"	"	"
814 El-'Abbas b. Mu'sā b. Isā b. 'Abbasī	"	"	"	"
815 El-Mutallib b. 'As-Sari b. 'El-	Mohammed b. 'Asdwa	"	"	"
816 'Ilaqam	Abū Bakr b. G'wā nāda	"	"	"
816 Sulayman b. Ghālib el-Baqfī	El 'Abbas b. Lahfa Muhammad b. Osūma	"	"	"
817 'A-Sari b. <sup>1</sup>	El-Harith b. Zur'a Meymūn b. 'A-Sari Dhu-el-Mukhārik	Ibrāhim b. Is'hāk Ibrāhim b. 'A-
820 <sup>2</sup> Mohammad b. 'A-Sari	Mohammad b. Kabis

<sup>1</sup> Gold coins of 'Abbad dated 196, 197, 198 (812-813) are in the Cairo collection.

<sup>2</sup> Gold coins of el-Mutallib dated 198, 199 (813-815), and silver of 199, are in H.M. and Cairo collections.

<sup>3</sup> Gold coin of el-'Abbas, dated 198, is in Cairo coll.

<sup>4</sup> Gold coins of es-Sari dated 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, (815-820) are in the B.M., Cairo, or Arlin Passba's colls.

<sup>5</sup> Gold coins of Mohammad b. es-Sari dated 205, 206 (820-2) are in the B.M., Cairo, and Hermilage colls.

III. UNDER 'ABRASID CALIPHS (continued)

CALIPH	GOVERNOR	WAR	FINANCE	JUSTICE	PENAL
843 El-Ma'mūn		'Obeydallāh b. es-Safī		Ibrahim b. el-'Ayyash <sup>1</sup>
822 'Obeydallāh b. es-Sari		Mu'adh b. 'Okba		"
826 'Abdallāh b. Tābir		Mu'adh b. 'Azīz		"
827 'Iṣā b. Yezid el-Gālikī		'Al-daweyh b. Gelala		"
829 'Omeir b. el-Welid		Mohammed b. 'Isā Shizād el Gālikī		"
829 'Isā b. Temimī		Mohammed b. 'Omeir		"
829 'Isā b. Yezid b. el-Abhāfi		[No Rādi]
830 'Abdaweyh b. C'ebela		Ibn 'Abdaweyh
831 'Isā b. Mansūr		Vāmis
832 El-Ma'mūn (the caliph)		Ibn Isfendiyār		Ibrāhīm az-Zuhri
832 Naqr b. 'Abdallāh (Kerdar)		El Mu'tasim b. Kardar		Ashmās <sup>2</sup>
833 El-Mo'tasim	834 El-Maqāfir	I. Keydar

<sup>1</sup> Gold coins of 'Obeydallāh dated 206, 207, 208, 209, 210 (821-826) are in the U.M. and Cairo colls.

<sup>2</sup> A glass weight of Ashmās, stamped by an under official in. (fig. 7), dated 223 (838) is in B.M. (Cat. 27C).

NAME	GOVERNOR	III. UNDER ABBASID CALIPHS ( continued )			PIRE
		WAR	FINANCE	JURISD.
833 El-Musta' fīn	834 Musa el-Hanafi			Mālik ibn Zuhri
	839 Malik b. Kaysar
	841 'Abd b. 'Abd al- 'Amri		Abd al-Wazir	Muhammad b. Mu-
842 El-Wāhiš	843 'Isā b. Marwān b.	"	"	"
	847 Harthama b. 'An-	Abu-Kutayfa	"	"
847 El-Mula- wekkāl	847 Nadr		"
	849 Hamm b. Mar-		"
	849 'Abd b. 'Abd al- 'Amri	Mo'awiya Nuqrash	"	El-Muntasir
	850 Isbāk b. Vahya	El-Haggig	"
	851 'Abd el-Wāfi b.	Mohammad b. Sudaymān el- Raġeli	El-Hārith b. Mu'āwiya
	852 'Abbas b. 'Isāk	Mohammad b. Humāni	Mu'āwiya b. Kha-
	855 'Abd al- 'Amri	"	'ab
	861 El-Muntasir
	862 El-Musta'in

III. UNDER 'ABBA SID CALIPHIS (continued)

CALIPHS	GOVERNOR	WAR	FINANCE	JUSTICE	PIEFTEE
866 El-Mo'tazz	867 Mu'adh b. Khābūr bān	Arguz b. Tarkhān	Ulugh dabbir	Ahmad b. Mu- tawwād	Bekkār b. Kuteyba
868 Ahmad b. Mu'ad- him		"	"	"	"
868 Arguz Tarkhān		"	"	"	Bābūk

CHAPTER III

TULX AND IKHSHID

868—969

Autorities.—El-Mas'ūl, G'emāl-ed-dīn of Aleppo, Ibn-el-Athīr, Ibn-Khalīl-kān, al-Makrīzī, Abū-l-Mahāsīn, as-Suyūtī, Ibn-Khaidūn.

Monuments.—Mosque of Ibn-Tūlūn, aqueduct south of Cairo, new Nilometer at Rōda.

Inscriptions.—Mosque, Nilometer (2), gravestones, two shop tickets, deeds of word (see van Berchem, Corpus inscr. arab.).

Cities.—Nīṣīn (i.e. el-Fusṭā'), Dāmascus, Aleppō, Emīnā, Antioch, Harrān, er-Kāfīkā, Palestine (i.e. er-Ramla).

Since 856 the governors of Egypt had been Turks, and twenty years before that, the province had been given in fee to successive Turks at Baghīd, who appointed lieutenant-governors to administer it for them. This change from Arab to Turkish rule was part of a revolution which was felt in most parts of the caliphate, and led to the extinction of the temporal authority of the "commander of the faithful." From the time when the Arabs came in contact with the Turks on the Oxus and brought them under their rule, Turkish slaves had been highly prized in Muslim households. Their physical strength and beauty, their courage, and their fidelity had won the trust of the great emirs, and especially of the caliphs, who believed they could rely more safely upon the devotion of these purchased foreigners than upon their own jealous Arabs or the Persians among whom they dwelt and who had hitherto had a large share in the administration of the empire. The young Turkish slave who served his master well usually acquired his freedom and received valuable court appointments. "The caliphs, who were often unable to appease the turbulent spirits of the native emirs, except by granting them special privileges and territorial rights, were gradually led into the opposite error in alienating the most powerful of their own subjects, and in giving all their confidence to these foreign slaves, who thus acquired the entire control of the interior of the palace. These illiterate and barbarous white slaves (or mamlûks), now incorporated into the society of the educated rulers of a great empire, soon became conversant with the law of the Koran. They adopted the language and religion of their masters. They studied science and politics; and when any of them became capable of undertaking the more difficult tasks or of occupying the more eminent posts in the court, they were emancipated, and appointed to the various government offices according to the talents they displayed. Thus manumitted Turks were appointed not only to the chief offices in the palace, but to the governorships of some of the most important provinces in the empire.<sup>1</sup> Not only so, but they were formed into a special body-guard by the caliph el-Mo'tâsim, son of Hârân er-Rashid, and from that time forward took the leading part in the setting up and putting down of the caliphs, and maintained a reign of terror in Baghdaâd.

Tâlîm was one of these slaves, a Turk of the Taghîzghân tribe, who was sent to Baghdaâd with other youths by the governor of Bukhârâ as a present to the caliph el-Ma'mûn in 815, and rose to high rank at court. His son (real or adopted) Ahmad, the future ruler of Egypt, was born in September, 835, and received the usual careful education of the age, studying not merely Arabic and the Koran, but jurisprudence and divinity according to the teaching of the great Muslim schoolman Abû Hanîfa. Not content with the able professors of Baghdaâd, he visited Tarsus several times to study under special lecturers, until he became himself an authority on points of criticism and doctrine. Along with this culture, he pursued with great industry and delight the course of military instruction given to the young Turks at Samarra, the caliph's new residence up the Tigris. On one of his journeys from Tarsus he was able to defeat some Arab marauders and rescue a large treasure which was being brought from Constantinople to the caliph; and later he was chosen to accompany the deposed pontiff el-Musta'in in his exile at Wāsit. When offered a handsome bribe to put the caliph out of the way, Ahmad indignantly refused. His loyalty brought him no disfavour among the Turks, however, and when the emir Bakbak, who had married the widow of Ishaq (†844), was presented to the sif of Egypt he sent his stepson Ahmad as his representative.

<sup>1</sup> E. T. Rogers, Course of the Tâlîm dynasty (Nomina Orient. iv.) 2.

Abu'l-Abbas Ahmad ibn-Tulun entered Fostat in September, 868, at the age of thirty-three. A rich friend advanced 10,000 D. to meet his expenses, since the new governor was apparently penniless, and having held no previous appointment was quite unversed in the official methods of squeezing his subjects. He was a man of great ability, however, and a good judge of men, and he soon made his authority felt. Throughout his reign he had an able coadjutor in his secretary Ahmad of Wāsit. He had to deal first with the treasurer, Ibn-Mudebbir, a crafty peculator, who had enjoyed a free hand with the revenue for some years, and kept up a state which outshone the governor's. He was always followed by a mounted escort of a hundred powerful young slaves, beautiful to behold, and dressed with elaborate finery, Persian cloaks, and silver-mounted whips. Judging the new governor by his own standard, the treasurer sent him 10,000 D. as a small douceur, and was surprised to find them returned. Ibn-Tulun presently informed him that instead of the money he would accept the guard, and the treasurer had to send him his escort of slaves. Finding his authority vanishing with his pomp, he appealed to the caliph to remove the imperturbable governor; but Ibn-Tulun stayed on. He had other enemies besides those of his ministry. The 'Alids rose to the west of Alexandria in 869; other 'Alids carried fire and sword through the district of Esnē in the Sa'id. Both were put down, not without hard fighting, and driven to the oases.

Meanwhile the nominal governor of Egypt, Ibn-Tūlūn's stepfather, was beheaded; but the appointment was fortunately given to the emir Bargīg, whose daughter was Ibn-Tūlūn's wife. The new nominee not only gave his son-in-law a free hand in Egypt,—writing simply, "Go your own way as you like"—but delivered into his charge the city of Alexandria and other places which had not been included in his original patent of command. Ibn-Tūlūn took over the government of the great port in 870, but wisely left the former commandant in office. His power was now so firm that when the province once more changed its nominal head in 872, he scarcely troubled to obtain the formal ratification of the new chief, el-Muwaffak, the caliph's brother. He was accordingly summoned to appear before the caliph at his palace of Samarra on the Tigris, to give an account of his stewardship. This too obvious manoeuvre of his enemies was met very simply by sending his secretary with ample bribes and tribute money, and it ended in strengthening his position. His two chief secret opponents in Egypt were got rid of—one was so terrified by his threats that he went home and died; the other, the treasurer, Ibn-Mu'lebbir, was glad to exchange his post for the exchequer of Syria.

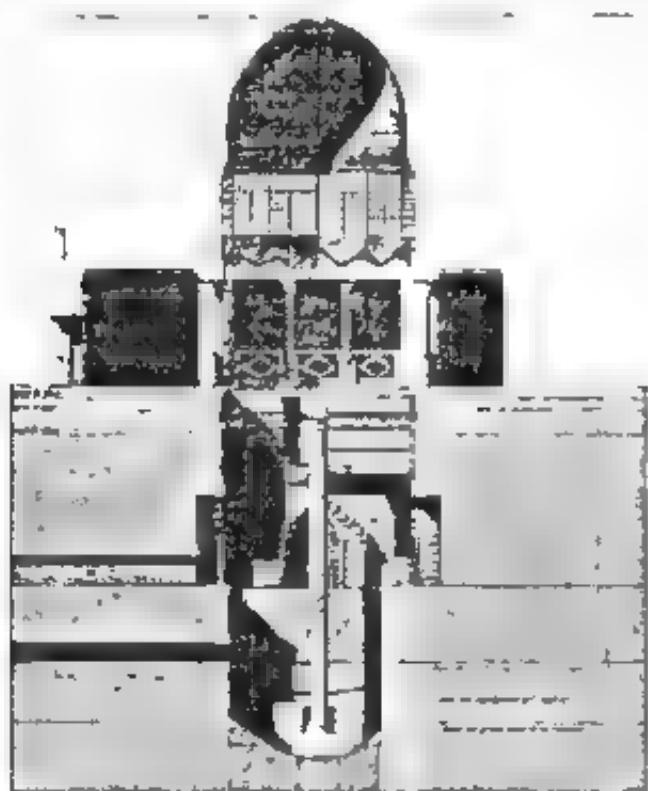

Fig. 11.—Section of Nilometer on island of Rōda, 9th century.

Ibn-Tulun now held kingly state in Egypt. The government house at el-Aksar, the official suburb of Fustat, was too small to house his numerous retinue and army. He was not content, either, with a mere governor's palace. In 870 he chose a site on the hill of Yeshikur,<sup>***</sup> between Fustat and the Muqattam hills, levelled the graves of the Christian cemetery there, and founded the royal suburb of el-Kata'i or "the Wards," so called because each separate class or nationality (as household servants, Greeks, Sodaris) had a distinct quarter assigned to it. The new town stretched from the present Rumeyta beside the citadel to the shrine of Zeyn-el-'Abidin, and covered a square mile. The new palace was built below the old "Dome of the Air," and had a great garden and a spacious enclosed horse-course or meydan adjoining it, with stews and a menagerie; the government house was on the south of the great mosque, which still stands, and there was a private passage which led from the residence to the oratory of the emir. A separate palace held the harem, and there were magnificent baths, markets, and all apparatus of luxury. The great mosque was not begun till 876-7 and took two years in building. It is remarkable for the use (for the first time in mosques) of brick piers, instead of stone columns taken from earlier monuments, and for being the earliest dated example (the pointed arches of the second Nilometer on the island of Roda are possibly a few years earlier) of pointed arches throughout the building,—earlier by at least two centuries than any in England. Its architect was a Copt, and was granted 100,000 dinars to build the mosque, and given 10,000 for himself, with a handsome allowance for life.<sup>1</sup> Another great work was the building by the same Coptic architect of an aqueduct to bring water to the palace from a spring in the southern desert.<sup>2</sup> Ibn-Tulun also dredged and cleared the canal of Alexandria, repaired the Nilometer on the island of Roda and built a fort there.

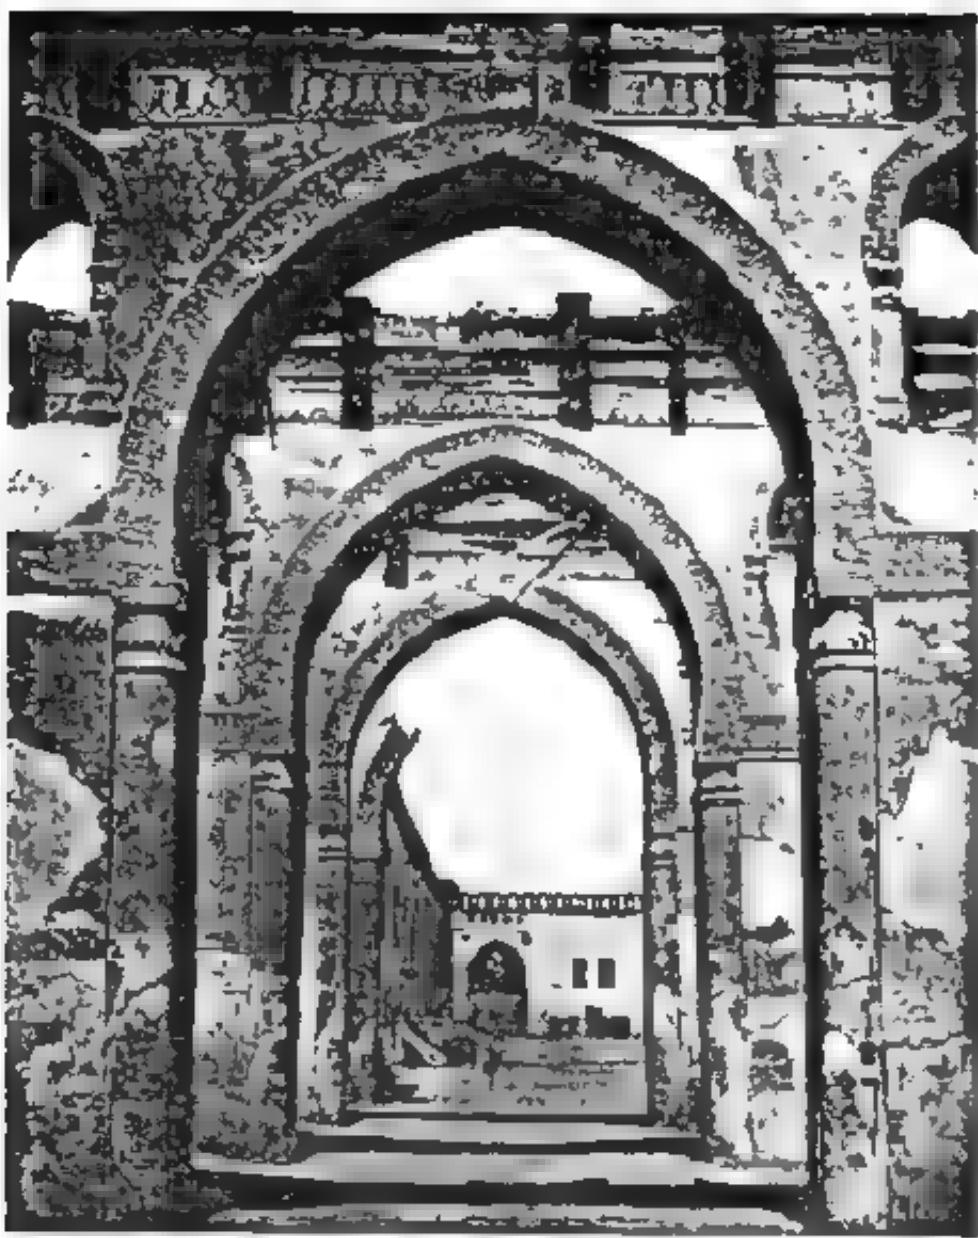

Fig. 12.—Mosque of Ahmad ibn Tulun at Cairo, 877-79.

When it is noted that in 870 the treasurer sent 730,000 D. as tribute to the caliph, and in four years 2,300,000 ; that some of the new buildings at Kāfir were estimated to have cost nearly half a million, that Ibn-Tulun gave to the poor at least 1000 D. a month beyond the obligatory alms, kept open house and spent 1000 D. a day

<sup>1</sup> The story of the origin of the curious corkscrew tower or minaret, in the winding of a strip of paper round the finger, is well-known. The true original of the tower however, seems to be the similar corkscrew tower at Samara, which Ibn-Tulun doubtless saw in his youth. Architects, however, throw doubt on the antiquity of Ibn-Tulun's minaret.

<sup>2</sup> A story is told that some objection was made to the water conveyed in this aqueduct, and Ibn-Tulun sent for the learned doctor Muhammad ibn-'Abd-el-Hakim. "I was one night in my house," he related, "when a slave of Ibn-Tulun's came and said, 'The emir wants thee.' I mounted my horse in a panic of terror, and the slave led me off the high road. 'Where art you taking me,' I asked. 'To the desert,' was the reply; 'the emir is there.' Convinced that my last hour was come, I said, 'God help me! I am an aged and feeble man, do you know what he wants with me?' The slave took pity on my fears and said, 'Beware of speaking disrespectfully of the aqueduct.' We went on till suddenly I saw torch-bearers in the desert, and Ibn-Tulun on horseback at the door of the aqueduct, with great was candles burning before him. I forthwith dismounted and salamed, but he did not greet me in return. Then I said, 'O emir, thy messenger hath grievously wronged me, and I think; let me, I beg, take a drink.' The pages offered me water, but I said, 'No, I will draw for myself.' I drew water while he looked on, and drank all I thought I should have borne. At last I said, 'O emir, God quench thy thirst at the rivers of Paradise' for I have drunk my fill, and know not which to praise most, the excellence of the cool, sweet, clear water, or the delicious smell of the aqueduct.' 'Let him retire,' said Ibn-Tulun, and the slave whispered, 'Thou hast hit the mark'" (Makridi, Akitat) on his table, was lavish to learned men, had a large army and a numerous household to pay, and costly forts to maintain on the frontier, it is incredible that he could have met all his expenses on the revenue of 4,300,000*D.* a year;<sup>1</sup> and the legend that he paid for his mosque with treasure which he dug up is natural enough. It is more than probable that he extorted the Coptic patriarch now and then in heavy fines, as the Christian writers allege, though he did not extort unjust taxes from the Coptic population, who enjoyed a rare immunity from persecution during his reign. The constantly increasing expenditure, however, led to the discontinuance of the annual surplus to the caliph's brother. El-Muwaffak prepared an army to depose the too powerful viceroy, but it came to rough ; the army got no further than Rakka, where it stopped for lack of funds. Nor did two rebellions in the Sa'id and in Barka succeed any better.

<sup>272</sup> Encouraged by this immunity, Iba-Tulun extended his borders. He had before this been on the point of occupying Syria at the caliph's desire, and though another governor was afterwards appointed, he held that he had a prior claim to the province. On the death of this governor, Mağür, who had proved a formidable and jealous obstacle to his advance, Iba-Tulun set aside the title of the son who had been appointed in Mağür's place, and throwing off all semblance of obedience to the caliph, <sup>273</sup> marched in April, 878, to Damascus and received the immediate homage of the officials and inhabitants. Thence he made a progress through Syria, accepting the allegiance of the chief towns, as far as Tarsus, the scene of his early studies. Only Antioch resisted, under Sime the Long, and after a bombardment by mangonels, aided by treason within, was stormed and sacked in September. Maysara and Adhana were next occupied, but Tarsus for the moment defied his attack. His dominions now stretched from the Euphrates and the frontier of the <sup>1</sup> G'emmāl ad-dīn, who gives these details, only mentions the Mārūd or land-tax, which (he says) rose from 800,000 under Ibn-Wudeib to 4,300,000 under Iba-Tulun. To this must apparently be added the poll-tax on non-Musulms, and other duties and contributions.

Byzantine empire to Barka on the Mediterranean, and Aswān at the first cataract of the Nile.<sup>1</sup> Leaving strong detachments at Rikka, Harrān and Damascus, to hold his new possession, and carrying away 600,000 D. which he

Fig. 13.—Founder's inscription in mosque of Ibn-Tūlūn, 879.

extorted from his old enemy Ibn-Mudebbir, the treasurer of Syria, he hastened back to Egypt, after just a year's absence, to deal with his eldest son, el-'Abbas, who had taken advantage of his temporary elevation to the office of vice-governor to throw off the paternal authority. On his father's approach, however, he lost courage, and carrying off all the treasure and war material he could lay hands on, retreated with 400 horse and 10,000 of his father's famous black infantry to Barka. His father tried persuasion, and sent the qadi Bekkar to reason with him, in vain ; the fatuous young man refused all offers, and dreamed of a North African kingdom. He even laid siege to Tripolis, and plundered Lebda, until driven off with heavy loss by the Aghlabid prince of Tunes. After eluding his pursuers for two years, he was at length defeated and captured by his father's troops, and brought to Fustat, where he witnessed (some say he was forced to) take part in the torture and execution of his fellow-rebels, received a hundred stripes himself, and spent the rest of his life in captivity.

<sup>1</sup> Ibn-Tūlūn first began to put his name on his coinage after this campaign. Hitherto the coins struck by him in Egypt bore only the name of the reigning caliph; but in A.H. 266 (879-880) the dinārs of Misr present the name of Ahmad ibn Tūlūn as well as the caliph's. He never omitted the caliph's name, but he did not add (as governors of other provinces did) the name of the regent el Muwaffak. His coins were issued at Misr in A.H. 266, 267, 268, 269, 270 (the year of his death); ar-Rāfiqa, 267, 268, 270; Damascus, 270.

The breach between Ibn-Tulun and his nominal superior el-Muwaffak, the caliph's brother, was widened when the latter trafficked with the loyalty of Lu'lū, the commander of the Egyptian detachment on the frontier at Rakka.<sup>1</sup> Lu'lū went over with all his army to the enemy, and even drove Ibn-

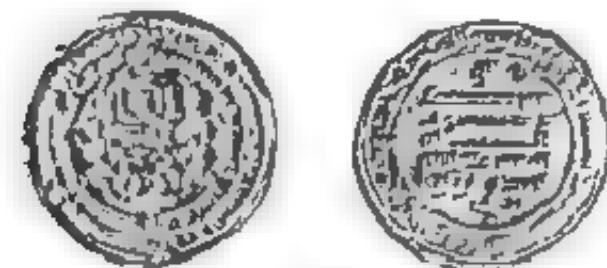

Fig. 14.—Dinar of Ahmad ibn-Tulun,
A.H. 261.

Tulun's representative Ibn-Safwan, out of Karkisijā, on the Euphrates. El-Muwaffak was far the most powerful prince in Mesopotamia, and he made his power felt so disagreeably to his brother, el-Mutemid, that in 882 the helpless caliph attempted to escape to Ibn-Tulūn, who had offered him protection, partly, no doubt, with a view to saving the annual tribute, and partly to diminish the influence of Muwaffak. The presence of the caliph under his wing at Mīṣr would, no doubt, have increased the ambitious governor's prestige, and might have changed to some extent the future both of the caliphate and of Egypt; but the fugitive was unhappily caught on his way, and taken back to Samarrā. An attempt of Ibn-Tulūn's to get possession of the holy city of Mekka, for his greater glory, was also frustrated. His troops were driven out, and he was publicly cursed in the sacred mosque.

<sup>1</sup> A dinar struck at er-Rifka (a suburb of er-Rakka) in A.H. 268 (881-2) bears the name of Lu'lū beneath that of Ahmad ibn Tulun (Lane-Poole, Cat. Corro. Collection, no. 905). In the following year Lu'lū threw over Ibn-Tulun and joined el-Muwaffak's party. In 270 a Rifka dinar appeared with Ibn-Tulun's name, but without Lu'lū's (Lavovs, Cat. Mon. Or., Egypt, no. 3).

These repulses only exasperated the governor of Egypt, and he showed his resentment by cutting the name of the regent Muwaffak out of the Friday bidding-prayer which (with the corage) in Muhammadan countries forms the official act of homage to the sovereign powers. He even assembled a meeting of kādīs and lawyers at Damascus, who proclaimed the deposition of the regent and his exclusion from the succession, on the ground of his ill-treatment of his brother the caliph. Bekkār, who had been kādī of Egypt for more than twenty years, and was distinguished for his scrupulous conscientiousness, refused to sign the declaration, of which both the grounds and legality were doubtful; he was accordingly thrown into prison, where he languished till his death, still holding his dignified office, and teaching students from the window of the gaol. The only result of these futile proceedings was that the caliph was forced by his impious brother to order Ibn-Tulūn to be cursed from the pulpit in every mosque in his dominions. There can be little doubt that if el-Muwaffak had not been taxed to the utmost in dealing with a serious revolt of the Zeng or East African slaves who had settled in lower Mesopotamia, Ibn-Tulūn's effrontery would have been more severely punished.

He had better fortune on the north-west border, where his friendly relations with the emperor had been changed to hostility, and Khalaf, his lieutenant at Tarsus, had (881) led a successful raid and returned with much booty. Again, in 883, the Romans under Keka Stypiotes suffered a disastrous defeat at Chrysobullon<sup>1</sup> near Tarsus at the hands of Ibn-Tulun's forces, in which at least 60,000 Christians are said to have fallen, and valuable spoils of gold and silver, jewelled crucifixes, sacred vessels, and vestments, besides 15,000 horses, were taken. The eunuch who had commanded the victorious army was so elated that he threw off his master's yoke, and Ibn-Tulun was obliged to march in person to vindicate his authority. It was a severe winter, and his opponent dammed the river, flooded the country, and nearly drowned the besieging army at Adlana. Ibn-Tulun was forced to retire to Antioch, where a copious indulgence in buffalo milk, following upon the exposure and privations of the campaign, brought on a dysentery. He was carried in a litter to Fustat, where he grew worse. In sickness the fierce emir was a terror to his doctors. He refused to follow their orders, flouted their prescribed diet, and when he found himself still sinking, he had their heads chopped off, or flogged them till they died. In vain Muslims, Jews, and Christians offered up public prayers for his recovery; Koran and Tora and Gospel could not save him; and he died in May, 884, before he had reached the age of fifty.

Fig. 15.—Title-deed (on wood) to a shop, 882.

Ahmad ibn-Tulun is described by Ibn-Khalikān, who used the almost contemporary biography of Ibn-ed-Dilîl, as "a generous prince, just, brave, and pious; an able ruler, an unerring judge of character. He directed in person all public affairs, re-peopled the provinces, and inquired diligently into the condition of his subjects. He admired men of learning, and kept every day an open table for his friends and the public. A monthly sum of 1000 D was expended by him in alms, and when one of his officials consulted him as to giving relief to a woman who wore a good veil and a gold ring, yet asked for charity, he answered, 'Give to every one who holds out the hand to you.' But with all these virtues he was too hasty with the sword, and it is related that 18,000 persons were put to death by him or died in his prisons. He knew the Korân by heart, and had a beautiful voice; none recited it more diligently than he." In spite of the necessity of a large revenue to furnish the means for his grandiose plans and magnificent buildings, and his extravagant court, so far from raising the taxes, he abolished Ibn-Mudebbir's new imposts, and encouraged peasant proprietorship and security of tenure, to use modern terms, so that his revenue was due more to better cultivation than to extortion. He left ten million dinars in his treasury, from seven to ten thousand mounted mamûks, twenty-four thousand slaves of the bodyguard, a stud of three hundred horses, thousands of mules, asses, and camels, and a hundred ships of war. He was at least the first Muslim, since the Arab conquest, who revived the power of Egypt and beautified her capital.

<sup>1</sup> Theophanes Contin., pp. 286-8 (ed. Bonn); George the Monk, p. 847 (ed. Bonn).

Abu-l-Geysh Khumârâweyh,<sup>1</sup> the second of Ahmad's seventeen sons (he had besides sixteen daughters), succeeded his father. The eldest son was still expiating his rebellion in prison, where his warders now made an end of him, to save disputes. A youth of only twenty years, with a decided taste for self-indulgence, and no experience of either war or government, Khumārweyh seemed marked out as the prey of craftier heads; and it needed one or two sharp lessons to rouse him to the degree of energy necessary for the preservation of his realm. It says much for his character that he was able to recover from his first humiliations, and not only to maintain but extend his inheritance. Two formidable antagonists, the Turkish governors of Mosul and Aabdt, on the Tigris and Euphrates, combined with the warden of Damascus to overthrow the supremacy of Egypt in Syria, and restore Khumārweyh's Asiatic possessions to the caliph, or rather to his active brother Muwaffak. They had a fair pretext, since Khumārweyh had no official title to the government of Egypt, whilst the governor of Mosul, Iblāy ibn Kūnagī, had received the caliph's diploma for it. There was no hereditary title at that date. They occupied Syria, supported by Muwaffak's son, Abū-l-'Abdās, who entered Damascus in February, 884. Khumārweyh had already sent troops by land and sea to oppose them, and an Egyptian force had been blockaded and defeated at Sheyzar, on the Orontes. He then led a fresh army of 70,000 men into Palestine, which encountered a small force of the enemy under Abū-l-'Abdās at et-Tawāhīn, "The Mills," on the Abe-Butrus river, near Ramia. Unhappily, Khumārweyh, who had never before seen a pitched battle, was seized with panic, and fled pell-mell to Egypt, followed by the greater part of his army. Only the reserve stood firm, under Sa'd el A'ar, and whilst their prince and comrades were vying with each other who should first reach safety at Mīq, this sturdy remnant fell upon the enemy, who were busily engaged in plundering the Egyptian camp, and utterly routed them. Sa'd searched in vain for his master, whose disgraceful flight was hardly credited, and then marched on Damascus, and from the recovered capital of Syria sent a despatch to his trembling sovereign announcing the unexpected news of a brilliant victory. As Khumārweyh stayed idly in Egypt for a whole year—a year marked by a violent earthquake, which shook down houses, damaged the mosque of 'Amr, and killed a thousand people in Fustat in a single day—the impression of his cowardliness was confirmed, and Sa'd, at Damascus, declined to serve such a master. On his declaration of independence, Khumāraweyh set out again, gained a decisive victory over his rebellious subject, and entered Damascus in June, 886. Continuing his march, he met the governor of Mōyl, Ibn-Kundāgik, in pitched battle, and checking a retreat with much personal bravery, drove the enemy in confusion as far as Samarrā on the Tigris. Having vindicated his character as a general, he concluded peace with Muwaṭṭak, and a diploma, signed by the caliph and his brother, and by the heir to the caliphate, was sent assigning him the governments of Egypt, Syria, and the Roman marches, for thirty years.

<sup>1</sup> Khumârâweyh's courage, almost entirely of gold like the rest of the Tâlîqat courage, was tested at Misr, A.H. 271 ($24,500) consecutively every year to A.H. 1895 (6); at Râbi'a, 270, 271, 275, 276, 278, 279; Damascus, 273, 275, 276, 277, 281; Emesa (Himâz), 274; Harrân, 276; Antioch, 276, 278, 279; Aleppo, 281; Edessa (Palestine, i.e. er-Rauâia), 277, 278.

Inspired by his successes, Khumāraweyh accepted an appeal to interfere in a contest then in progress between Ibn-Abi-Sīg, the governor of Anbār, and his former ally, Ibn-Kundāgik, and the result of a campaign in Mesopotamia was the capture of Rakka,<sup>1</sup> and the recognition of the prince of Egypt as regent and governor of Mōyl and Mesopotamia in the public prayers. His new vassal, Ibn-Abi-Sīg, however, proving fickle, invaded Syria, and Khumāraweyh once more displayed his generalship by defeating him in May, 888, near Damascus, and pursuing him as far as Beled on the Tigris, on the bank of which the conqueror built a lofty throne to sit in triumph. The war of the emirs kept him in Mesopotamia and Syria for more than a year. One result of his enhanced reputation was the adhesion of Yāzīd, or Bazmāz, the eunuch governor of Tarsus, who had repudiated the authority of the Tūlūnids since 883, but now signified his homage with presents of 30,000 D., 1000 robes, and arms, and followed them up with 50,000 D. more. Several raids were made from Tarsus into Roman territory in 891-4.

<sup>1</sup> Coins of er-Rakka (i.e. Rakka) of A.M. 273 and 275 bear the name of Khumāraweyh, but one of 274 (A.D. 887-8) omits his name. This was doubtless struck during Ibn-Kundāgik's occupation of Rakka.

The death of Muwaffak in 891, followed by that of Ibn-Kundagik, and of the caliph Mo'tamid in 892, led to a closer understanding between Egypt and Baghdad. The former diploma was renewed for thirty years, and Khumārweyh offered to marry his daughter Kātī-en-Nedī ("Dewdrop") to the caliph's son, El-Motadid, however, preferred to wed her himself. The bride was hardly ten years old, but the wedding was postponed till 895, when she was nearly twelve. An exchange of costly presents preceded the marriage; the caliph's det included a million dirhems, rare perfumes from China and India, and various precious things; the bride was carried on a litter from Egypt to Mesopotamia, and at every night's halt she found a palace built ready for her with every possible luxury prepared. Her portion included 4000 jewelled waistbands, ten coffers of jewels, and a thousand gold mortars for pounding the perfumes for her elaborate toilette. This aristocratic alliance cost Khumārweyh a million dinars; but in return his dominion was once more confirmed from Hitt on the Euphrates to Barja on the Mediterranean, and his annual tribute to the caliph was fixed at 300,000 D. The yearly pay of his troops in Egypt amounted to 900,000 D.; and his kitchen alone cost him 23,000 D. a month. The caliph viewed with satisfaction the impoverishment of his formidable vassal, whose extravagance increased with every year. The passion which Ibn-Tūlūn had shown for splendid building was fully shared by his son, who enlarged the palace in Kātī, and converted the Meydān into a garden stocked with all kinds of sweet-smelling flowers, planted in the form of sentences and other designs, with rare trees, and date palms set with gilded tanks of water. An aviary was filled with beautiful birds. His "golden-house" was adorned with painted images of himself and his wives and singers, despite the Muslim prejudice against portraiture. And to soothe his restless nights an air-bed was laid upon a lake of quicksilver,<sup>1</sup> nearly a hundred feet square (me.), and rocked very agreeably, moored by silken cords to silver columns. A tame lion from his menagerie guarded his master whilst he slept.

Neither the lion nor his body-guard of vigorous young Arabs from the truculent Hawf could save the voluptuous prince from the jealousies of his harem. Early in 866<sup>2</sup> some domestic intrigue ended in his being murdered by his slaves whilst on a visit to Damascus. His murderers were crucified, and, amid loud lamentations his body was buried beside his father's, not far from his stately palace, under Mount Mukattam. Seven Koran readers were engaged in reciting the sacred book at the tomb of Ibn-Tū'lūn, and when the bearers brought the body of Khumāraweyh and began to lower it into the grave they happened to be chanting the verse, "Brave him and hurl him into the fire of hell" (Kor. xlvi. 47).

His eldest son, Abū-l-'Asikir Geysh,<sup>3</sup> who succeeded him, was a boy of fourteen, utterly incapable of taking a serious view of his position, and wrapped up in the pleasures and follies of his age. Syria and the northern frontier disowned his authority, the army and government were neglected, the treasury empty; and after murdering three of his uncles the young savage was himself assassinated by his troops, after a few months' abuse of power. His last public act was to throw two of his murdered uncles' heads to the mutineers, crying, "There are your emirs for you!" His younger brother, Abū-Musāl Harūn,<sup>4</sup> was now set on the throne with Ibn-Abālī, the major domo, as regent: but the prince was as careless and incapable as his brother, and the regent was no statesman. The Turkish officers did what they pleased: an uncle led a rebel army to Fustat, but was defeated; and Syria and Tarsus were under no sort of control, though the caliph accorded Hārūn the patent as governor of Syria and Egypt, on condition of paying a yearly tribute of 450,000<sup>L</sup>, and resigning the northern districts of Syria. The Karmatis (Carmathians) overran Syria and laid siege to Damascus, and the Egyptian armies suffered heavy losses. The caliph at last found it necessary to interfere. Strengthened by a decisive victory over the Carmathians, and supported by some leading

<sup>1</sup> Traces of the quicksilver were found in later years on excavating the ground after the destruction of the palace.

<sup>2</sup> A coin of Miṣr, A.M. 28; (866) bears the name of Geysh b. Khumāraweyh.

<sup>3</sup> Harūn's coins are struck at Miṣr, A.H. 283—92; Damascus, 284, 285; Aleppo, 285, and Palestine, 285, 290, 291.

Egyptian emirs in Syria, he sent a fleet from Tarsus to Damietta and an army overland to 'Abbāsa, a small town on the Syrian frontier, a day's march from Bilbeys, developed out of one of the rest-houses erected to smooth the progress of "Dewdrop" to her nuptials at Baghdad. Here Hārūn assembled his half-hearted troops and here, as he lay intoxicated in bed, two of his uncles entered his tent and made away with his useless life!<sup>1</sup> The murderer Sheybān, son of Ibn-Tūlūn, took his nephew's government, and prudently withdrew the army to Miṣr, where he laboured, in spite of a depleted treasury, to win popularity by promises and gifts. The caliph's general, Muhammad b. Suleymān, pursued, and after a brief resistance Sheybān surrendered on terms, and left his army to its fate. Muhammad entered Kāfār on Jan. 10, butchered most of the black troops, burnt their quarters and utterly demolished the beautiful city which Ibn-Tūlūn had built. The mosque was respected, but the houses were sacked and pulled down, the gates were thrown open, the women outraged, and the people used as brutally as if they had been acathen. After an orgy of devastation, plunder, <sup>1</sup> Dec. 29-30. Other accounts ascribe the murder to his slaves, under his uncle's orders, or to a Maghribi soldier in a camp broil.

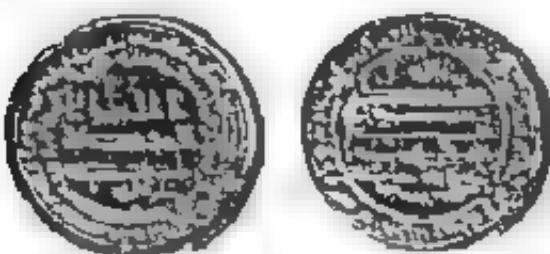

Fig. 16. Dirhār of Hārūn b. Khumāraweyh, Mihr, 904.

and extortion, which lasted four months, the caliph's army withdrew, taking Sheybān and all the remaining members of Tūlūn's family as prisoners to Baghdād. The dynasty had lasted thirty-seven years and four months, during which Egypt had regained much of her ancient importance, and her capital had reached a height of wealth and luxury unknown since the Arab conquest.

---

THE IKHSHID.

Authorities.—El-Mas'udi, G'emmāl eu-din, Ibn-el-'Athir, Ibn-Khalikān, el-Makrizi, Abū l-Mahāsin, es-Suyati, el-Idāki.

Inscription.—Of Kāfir on east wall of Ibrāhīm at Jerusalem.

Coin.—Minted at Miṣr (Fustāt), Fūṣṭan (Ramla), Damascus, Hims, Tiberias.

For thirty years after the fall of the house of Tūlūn Egypt remained in an unsettled state. It was once more a dependent province, but the caliphs had become too weak to exert their authority, and the government was in the hands of Turkish soldiers. The armies sent from Baghdād, to hold Egypt against internal revolt and foreign invasion, dictated their own terms to successive governors, and the man who would rule the province must first be acceptable to the troops, whose favour depended upon their pay. Next to the generals, therefore, the most powerful personage was the treasurer, and this office was held during the whole of this disturbed period by one family, called Mādarāni (from their birthplace Mādarāyā, near Bagra, on the Euphrates), who gradually acquired all but supreme power in Egypt. The other officials were of less importance under this military tyranny than in the earlier period of provincial government, and only one kādi deserves commemoration, the universally revered Ibn-Harbaweyh, the last judge whom the governors visited in state, and who did not sue to receive them.

The feeble hold which the caliphs' governors retained on the country is shown by the successful usurpation of an obscure but spirited young man named Ahmad ibn el-Khalangi, who collected in Palestine a handful of Egyptians who sympathized with the fallen house of Tulun; seized Ramla, and recited the public prayers in the three names of the caliph, as head of church and state, Ibrahim (a captive son of Khumāravār) as governor, and himself as his deputy. The people listened placidly, and seemed interested in this curious band of adventurers, driven from house and home, and without any visible means of subsistence. The troops led against them by 'Isā, who had taken over the government of Egypt from the 'Abbasid general, retreated step by step, and in September, 901, Khalangi entered Faiyūm and proclaimed in the prayers the same three names as at Ramla. The people, who had not forgotten the glorious days of Ibn-Tulun, rejoiced at the shadowy restoration, and in the height of enthusiasm painted themselves and their horses yellow with saffron. The adventurer appointed the necessary officers of administration, and took up his residence in the governor's house unopposed. His popularity and following increased with his immunity. It is true he found an empty treasury, for 'Isā had carried off the public money together with all the account-books and most of the clerks, so that it was impossible to discover the due assessments of the tax-payers. But Khalangi did not trouble himself much about legality, and bade his collectors draw the revenue as best they could, covering their extortions with an orderly distribution of receipts and promises of reimbursement on the recovery of the tax books. The wonderful young man next sent troops by sea and land to Alexandria (though the real governor of Egypt was encamped hard by), captured the city, and brought back in triumph not only the governor's treasure, but some of the missing accountants. Meanwhile the caliph, who did not recognize the self-constituted lieutenant-governor, sent an army from Mesopotamia to bring him to reason, but Khalangi drove it away from el-Arish with much slaughter. The time of reckoning, however, was at hand. A defeat of part of his army by 'Isā was followed by the arrival by sea and land of stronger forces from the caliph, which effected a junction with 'Isā; and after a series of determined engagements, Khalangi was forced back upon Fustat, where he was betrayed by his friends to the tardily vindicated government, and sent to the caliph at Bagdad to be displayed on a camel as a fearful example to the whole city, and then executed (May, 906). That a mere adventurer should have held the capital of Egypt and defied the caliph's armies for eight months is a striking comment on the insecurity of the government.<sup>16</sup>

To add to the confusion came the danger of foreign invasion. The famous dynasty of the Fatimid caliphs<sup>17</sup>—the greatest Shi'a power in mediaeval history—was

<sup>16</sup> The following is the list of the governors of Egypt from the downfall of the Tulund dynasty to the accession of the Ikhshid:—

CALIPHS.	GOVERNORS.
El-Muktefi. 905	'Isā b. Mohammad en-Nishari. Usurpation of el-Khalangi, Sept., 905— May, 906.
908 El-Muktadir.	910 Tekin el-Khassa el-G'ezri. 915 Dhukā er-Rumi. 919 Tekin restored. 921 Mahmud b. Hamal (for three days). 921 Tekin again (for a few days). 921 Hilāl b. Bedr. 923 Ahmad b. Keyghalagh. 924 Tekin (for fourth time).
932 El-Kāhir.	933 Mohammad b. Tekin.
933 El-Riqi.	933 Mohammad b. Tughrī the Ikhshid (absent). 933 Ahmad b. Keyghalagh. 934 Usurpation of Mohammad b. Tekin, June— July.
	935 The Ikhshid.

The marshals were frequently changed under these governors; Mohammad b. Tahir was the most important. The chief qādi under the first seven governors to 924 was Ibn-Harbawayh. The treasurers were Abū-Zunbar el-Mādarāni and his successor Mohammad el-Mādarāni.

beginning its conquest of North Africa. In 900 the last of the once powerful house of the Aghlabids of Tunis came flying to Egypt, and his pursuers were not far behind. In 913-4 Khunza, the Fatimid general, entered Barka, committing abominable atrocities; and, in July, 914, joined by el-Kâim, the son of the first Fatimid caliph el-Mahdi, he occupied Alexandria without opposition—the inhabitants in panic had taken to their ships—and thence, avoiding Fustat, advanced as far as the Fayyûm. There the invaders were attacked and defeated by the Egyptian army—strongly reinforced from Baghdad—and driven out of Egypt. Five years later they returned to the attack; the Alexandrians had again to take to the water, their city was sacked, the Fayyûm devastated, and fire and sword carried as far as Ushmunayn. Meanwhile the Fatimid fleet of eighty-five sail anchored in Alexandria harbour. The caliph's admirals could only collect twenty ships at Tarsus to send against it, but so well were they handled that most of the enemy's vessels were burned with naphtha, and their crews and soldiery killed or brought prisoners to Fustat. On land, however, the outlook was less hopeful. Ducas the Greek (Dhu'l er-Râbi), who was then governor, had great difficulty in getting the Egyptian troops to move, they had to be bribed with gratuities, and even then they timidly entrenched their camp at Gîza to prevent surprise. At this critical moment Ducas died, and his successor, Tekin, was fortunately a persona grata with the troops, and inspired some confidence among the panic-stricken population. The invaders in the Fayyûm, moreover, were suffering severely from famine and plague, brought on by their own excesses. Their attack on the Gîza camp, now protected by a double ditch, was repulsed at about the same date as the victory off Alexandria; but they still held Upper Egypt, and Tekin hardly attempted to dislodge them, even when strongly reinforced by 3000 fresh troops sent from Baghdad. He was hampered by intrigues at home, for both the Kâdî and Mâdarâni the treasurer, with many other leading persons, were discovered to be in treasonable correspondence with the Fātimid caliph and eager to welcome him at Fustāt. With treachery in the capital, and Alexandria in the enemy's hands, Tekīn stood on the defensive, until a second contingent from Mesopotamia came to his relief. Then, at last, in the spring of 920 the Egyptian army marched against the invaders, and a series of engagements in the Fayyūm and at Alexandria, ended before the close of the year in the retreat of the Fātimids to Barbary.

The condition of the country after their expulsion was <sup>920</sup> chaotic. The eunuch Mūnis who, as commander of the troops from Baghdad, had been dictator of Egypt for some years, and had deposed and set up governors as he pleased, was at last recalled in 921; but the soldiers continued to dominate the government: disbanded troops harried the country and plundered and murdered the folk; and the disorder was so great that even Tekīn, when appointed governor for the fourth time, because no one else could pacify the army, found it necessary for safety to quarter his troops in his own palace. Some degree of order was at length restored, but after his death, in March, 933, his son was hooted out of the country by the army, clamouring for arrears of pay; the treasurer Mādarānī was in hiding; rival governors contended for power, mustered their troops, and skirmished over the distracted country, and a fearful earth-<sup>934</sup>quake, which laid many houses and villages low, followed by a portentous shower of meteors, added to the terror of the populace.

In this desperate state of affairs the Ikhshid <sup>1</sup> took over <sup>935</sup> the government of Egypt in August, 935. It needed an exceptionally strong man to meet the emergency, and the Ikhshid proved himself equal to the position. Mohammad b. Taghī came of a princely family in Ferghāna on the Iaxartes, who bore the title of Ikhshid in the same manner as the sovereigns of Persia and Tabaristan were styled Ksra (Chosroes) and Ispehbedh. His grandfather G'off was among the Turkish officers imported into Irak by the caliph Mo'tasim, son of Harun er-Rashid; and his father, the emir Tuglq, had served with distinction in the armies of Khurrawayh, fought against the Romans when commandant of Tarsus, and had been rewarded with the government of Syria. The pride of success brought its punishment, and he ended his life in the prison of Damascus. His son Mohammad, the future ruler of Egypt, who shared his captivity, obtained his own release, and, after various vicissitudes of fortune, took service under Tekm, was appointed to the command of the Seditious district of the Hawf in Lower Egypt, and after holding various appointments in Syria, where he gained the high approval of the caliph, became governor of Damascus in 930. Three years later he was nominated by el-Kahir to the charge of Egypt, but the state of Syria did not then permit his leaving, and though he was duly recognized as governor in the public prayers at Fustat in 931, and sent a deputy to represent him, another governor temporarily filled his place until he came in person, on a second nomination by the caliph Rad, in 932. The virtual ruler of Egypt, Malarini the treasurer, instigated the governor to resist the appointment, and to oppose the entrance of the Ikhshid. They were, however, completely routed at Farans, and the fleet from Syria, sailing up the Nile from Tinnis to Giza, commanded the capital until the Ikhshid brought his army up and took possession.

<sup>1</sup> He was allowed to use the ancestral title by special permission of the caliph four years after his arrival in Egypt. His coinage, like that of the Tūlūnids, was almost all of gold, and was issued from the mints of Mār (i.e. Fustāt) in A.H. 328 (A.D. 939-40) and 333 (944-5); Filastīn (Ramla), 331, 332, 333; Damascus, 333, 334.

How largely the previous anarchy was due to the incapacity and jealousy of the governors and their officers is evident from the fact that during the eleven years of the Ikhshid's firm government we do not read of a single insurrection or disturbance. The army recognized its master, and his Syrian troops overawed whatever disaffection may have subsisted among the Egyptians. He was an energetic yet cautious general, and his immense strength—for no other man could stretch his bow—inspired respect. Yet he is said to had gone in fear of his life, and to have taken extraordinary precautions against assassination. He preferred peace to war, and would conclude a treaty and submit to loss of territory, and even payment of tribute, sooner than continue a doubtful struggle. His powerful army of 400,000 men, of whom 8000 formed his bodyguard, not only prevented any serious attempt of the Fatimids to renew their invasions, after they were driven back from Alexandria in the first year of his reign, but also gave him weight in the scrimmage then surging round the tottering caliphate. The temporal sway of the "commander of the faithful" had by this time disappeared. The governors of the various provinces had acquired sovereign powers. The Buwayhids held Persia, the Samanids the lands beyond the Oxus, the Hamdanids Mesopotamia and a number of ambitious Turkish emirs fought for the possession of Rûm and the office of gaurd to the unhappy pontiff of Islam. The Ikhshid's efforts were chiefly directed towards preserving his Syrian province against the aggression of one or other of these turbulent neighbours. He first came in conflict with the emir Iba-Râk, who without provocation seized Hims and occupied Damascus. After an Egyptian defeat, probably at el-Arish on the frontier, and a sanguinary but indecisive battle at el-Laggûn, twenty miles from Tiberias,<sup>100</sup> peace was made on the terms that Iba-Râk retained Syria north of Ramla and received a yearly tribute of 140,000*D.* from the Ikhshid. This understanding was partly due to the good feeling produced by the chivalry of the emir, who was so distressed to find the corpse of one of the Ikhshid's brothers among the slain at Laggûn that he sent his own son to his adversary as an atonement, to be dealt with as he chose. Not to be outdone in generosity, the Ikhshid clothed the intended sacrifice in robes of honour and sent him back in all courtesy to his father. Of course the youth married the daughter of his chivalrous host, now joined in the friendly ties of treaty and alliance. The episode forms a pleasing contrast to the many barbarities of the age.

After Iba-Râk's death, two years later, the Ikhshid recovered Syria and re-entered Damascus without striking a blow. To Syria and Egypt the caliph el-Muttaki now added the governorship of the holy cities of Mekka and Medina, and the hereditary principle was established when the Ikhshid made the captains and soldiers of his army do homage to his elder son as their future prince. Tossed between the powerful dynasty of the Hamdānids and the contending emirs Tūzūn and el-Baridi, the wretched caliph, driven out of Baghdad, turned for succour to the Ikhshid, who came north to recover Aleppo from an aggressive Hamdānid, and after settling his own affairs, had an interview with his spiritual suzerain on the Euphrates opposite Rakka, and pressed him to seek refuge with him in Syria or Egypt. The caliph, however, stood in too great terror of the other emirs to venture upon so critical a step, nor would he even accept an offer of troops, though he took a subsidy of gold, and a vast amount of money passed into the hands of all the court. He let his great vassal depart, after showing him exceptional and touching favour, and confirming the government of Egypt and Syria to him and his heir for a term of thirty years; and trusted himself to the sworn honour of Tūzūn a month later, only to be treacherously blinded and deposed. The shrieks of the victim and his wives were drowned in a tattoo of drums and the acclamation of his successor.

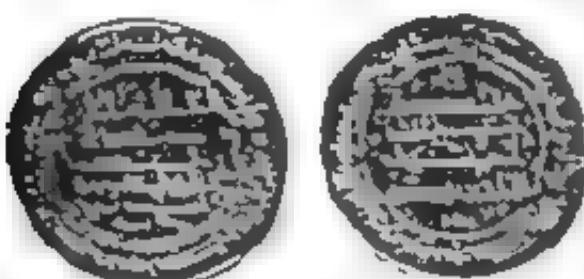

Fig. 17. Dials of Muhammad el-Ikhshid, Palestine, 913

The Ikhshid was still far from secure on his northern frontier. Aleppo was reoccupied by the Hamdānid leader, Seif ed dawla, before the close of the year, and an army despatched from Egypt under the eunuchs Kafur and Yāqūt was met at er-Rastan (Arethus) on the Orontes, and routed with the loss of 4,000 prisoners, besides 4,000 killed and drowned. Seif ed dawla proceeded to annex Damascus, and the Ikhshid was forced to march against him in person with a large army. They met near Kinnasrin. The Ikhshid placed his light troops, armed with short lances, in front, and kept a body of 10,000 chosen men, whom he called the "standfasts," in the rear. The light troops were quickly broken by the Hamdanid attack, and the enemy, thinking the victory already won, fell to plundering the baggage. Whereupon the Ikhshid flung his "standfasts" upon them with complete success and scattered them in all directions. The prince of Egypt re-entered Aleppo, and then Damascus, whence he negotiated a strangely unfavourable treaty with his vanquished enemy: he agreed to abandon Aleppo and northern Syria to the Hamdanid, and to pay him an annual tribute in return for the possession of Damascus. The explanation seems to be that the Ikhshid found the guardianship of northern Syria too troublesome a business at his age, for he was now sixty-four. He survived the campaign but a year, and died at Damascus in July, 940, <sup>AD</sup> and was buried at Jerusalem, where his successors also lie.

Of his government in Egypt little is recorded, and though like Ibn-Tulun, he was a builder, and set up a beautiful palace in the pleasure-ground called the "Garden of Kiffr," which lay west of the present Suk-en-Nakhshin, no trace of his buildings remain. The historian Mas'udi, who visited Egypt during his reign, is more occupied with the pyramids and other wonders than with contemporary buildings or people. He gives no description of the palace or the court, or of its master, nor does he throw any light upon the condition of the inhabitants. He does, however, give some account of the system of irrigation, and describes the cutting of the canal dams on the 14th of September, and their closure (in the delta) in January. "The Night of the Bath (Leylat el Ghâts)," he writes, "is one of the great ceremonies, and the people all go to it on foot on the 10th of January. I was present in 370 [942] when the Ikhshid Mohammad b. Tughiq lived in his house called el-Mukhtara ('the elect') in the island that divides the Nile in two. He ordered the bank of the island and the [opposite] bank of el-Fustat to be illuminated each with a thousand torches, besides private illuminations. Muslims and Christians, by hundreds of thousands, crowded the Nile on boats, or in kiosks over looking the river, or [standing] on the banks, all eager for pleasure, and lying in equipage, dress, gold and silver cups, and jewellery. The sound of music was heard all about, with singing and dancing. It was a splendid night, the best in all Asia for beauty and gaiety; the doors of the separate quarters were left open, and most people bathed in the Nile, knowing well that [on that night] it is a sure preservative and cure for all disease.<sup>1</sup> He also states that the Ikhshid gave leave to people to dig for treasure, of which they said they had found clues in ancient manuscripts: but they discovered only caves and vaults full of statues, which were made of bones and dust—an early reference to mummies.<sup>2</sup> But if we know little of the internal affairs of Egypt under the Ikhshid, it is at least clear that he brought repose to the distracted country, and that he established for the first time an hereditary principality recognised by the caliph, and practically implying independence. The tenure indeed was limited to thirty years, and confirmation by each successive caliph was a necessary and expensive formality, but in capable hands the virtual independence of his dynasty was assured

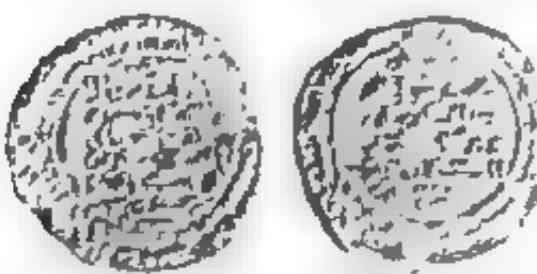

Fig. 18. Dirhem of Abu'l-Kasim b. al-Ikhshid, Damascus, 949.

Whether the Ikhshid's two sons Abu'l-Kasim Üngür (946-961)<sup>3</sup> and Abu'l-Hasan 'Ali (961-965), who nominally succeeded,<sup>1</sup> were capable or not, they were allowed no opportunity of proving it. The elder was only fourteen at his father's death, and though the younger, 'Ali, had reached the age of twenty-three when his turn came to enjoy the name of governor he was kept in the same state of pupilage as his brother by the black eunuch Kâfur, who acted as regent of what may now almost be called the kingdom of Egypt. They were given a comfortable allowance of 400,000 D., and bidden to enjoy themselves and not meddle with affairs of state. They submitted with scarcely a struggle, enjoyed their harem or Kurâ, according to their tastes, and died in luxurious obscurity, when (905) their black tyrant ascended the throne with the caliph's approval, as "master" (ustâd) of Egypt and its dependencies.<sup>2</sup> Abû-l-Misk Kâfur ("Musky Camphor") was an Abyssinian slave bought from an ottoman for a matter of less than ten pounds by the Ikhshid, who discovering his merits made him governor to his two sons. The relation of tutor and ward lasted for their lives. Kâfur was doubtless an excellent servant, though not always a successful general; but when in power he showed all the unbridled love of luxury and ease that marks the black in office. Few external difficulties troubled him; for after a campaign against the ever-encroaching Hamdânîd, in which the Ikhshid's energetic brother Hasan, accompanied by Kâfur, won two signal victories over Seyît-ed-dawla, near Laggun and on the Marg 'Adhra by Damascus, and the Egyptian army entered Aleppo, peace was concluded on the same basis as in 942, except that the tribute then imposed was discontinued. The consent of the caliph (or his keeper) to the succession of the two young princes to the government of Egypt, Syria, and the holy cities, was easily obtained, and in the latter part of Kafur's administration not only Damascus but the whole of Syria as far as Aleppo and Tarsus was again incorporated under the rule of Egypt. Beyond some temporary disturbances at the Mekka pilgrimages in 953-4, and a raid of the Karmatians upon Syria in 953, and the capture of the great Egyptian caravan of 20,000 camels in 966, there was little trouble abroad, and in Egypt, in spite of a series of terrible earthquakes, a great fire which destroyed 1700 houses in Fusqat, bad Niles, and much consequent scarcity and distress, the people seem to have remained strangely quiet. Even an irruption of the Nubians, who carried fire and sword, slaughter and famine through the Saïd in 963 did not stir up a revolt. The Ikhshid had got the Egyptians into order, and the big black eunuch "Cimphor" evidently knew how to maintain it.

<sup>1</sup> The "Id-el-Maghtas" or "feast of the tank" was really the Christian Epiphany, in memory of Christ's baptism (Abū-'Ubayd, p. 129, note). Mas'udi, Murūj-adh-Dhakab, II. 364-5. <sup>2</sup> Ibid., II. 419.

<sup>3</sup> Coins bearing Abu'l-Kasim's name were issued at Misr in A.H. 335 (946-7), 337, 339, 341, 342; Filastin, 335, 336, 337, 339, 341, 345.

346, 347 (958-9); Damascus, 338 (949-50); Hama, 336; Tâliyya (Tilberas) 337 (948-9).

<sup>1</sup> Coins bearing the name of 'Ali b. el Ikhshid were issued at Mâlik in A.H. 350, 351, 352, 353, 354 (963-5); Fikrîn, 350, 351, 352, 353, 355; the last must have been struck within eleven days of his death on 11 Moharram, 355 (7 Feb. 964).

<sup>2</sup> No coins bear Kâfur's name: his currency was in the name of the caliph alone.

Kafur was at once the Lucullus and the Macceenas of his age. He had contrived to acquire some cultivation, as most clever slaves did, and he loved to surround himself with poets and critics, and listen to their discussions of an evening, or make them read him the history of the caliphs of old. Like all blacks he delighted in music. He had control of vast sums of money, and he scattered it liberally among his literary friends, who repaid him in subtile verse. The celebrated poet el-Mutanabbi was among his intimates for a couple of years, and from his odes one gains such a picture of the "master" as an avowed panegyrist, who afterwards became a bitter satirist of his patron, may afford. When another poet explained in choice verse that the frequent earthquakes of the time were due to Egypt's dancing for joy at Kafur's virtues, the pleased Ethiopian threw him a thousand dinars. A sheriff of the family of the Prophet who once picked up his riding-whip for him, found himself suddenly the owner of a baggage-train worth £5,000.<sup>1</sup> On his table, "Camphor" was lavish : he had the Black's jolly sensuality. The daily provision for his kitchen consisted in 100 sheep, 100 lambs, 200 geese, 200 fowls, 1000 pigeons and other birds, and 100 jars of sweets. The daily consumption amounted to 1,000 lb. of meat, besides fowls and sweets, and 10 skins of liquor were allowed to the servants alone. A favourite drink was quince-cider, for which the kadi of Arvūt sent 10,000 quince-apples every season.

Fig. 19.—Dinar of Abu'l-Kasim b. el-Ikhshid, Mint, 950.

On Kāfir's death in April, 968, after nineteen years of virtual and three of titular rule, the chief officers of the court immediately assembled to elect a prince, the majority agreeing to accept the choice of the majority. Such a proceeding was without a precedent in Egypt, and shows how the authority of the caliph—the nominal sovereign—was ignored. The choice fell upon a child of eleven, Abū-l-Fawārāh Ahmad, son of 'Ali b. el-Ikhshid,<sup>2</sup> who was forthwith acknowledged in the public prayers as ruler of Egypt, Syria, and the holy cities, with his second cousin, el-Hoseyn b. 'Obeydallāh b. Tughj, as next heir. Ibn el-Furat undertook the finances, and Samuel, the former director of the pigeon-post, ventured upon the war office. The extortions and niggardliness of the one, and the incompetence of the other, led to a military revolt, and Huseyn assumed the regency.<sup>3</sup> It was not for long. The helpless condition of the government did not escape the shrewd observation of el-Mo'izz, the fourth Fatimid caliph of Barbary, and the ambition to be master of Egypt, which had only slumbered since the Ikhshid's accession, revived in fresh vigour. The inroads of the Karmatis in Syria, and the distracted state of 'Irāk, precluded the fear of interference from the east, and the opportunity was not to be neglected. A little more than a year after Kāfir's death, the Fatimid army entered Fustat. With the fall of the last Ikhshid Egypt ceased for two centuries to be numbered among the provinces of the eastern orthodox caliphate.

<sup>1</sup> Coins of Abū'l-Fawārāh are dated A.H. 358 (968-9) at Mīr and Fārisīn.

<sup>2</sup> A coin with the name of el-Hoseyn b. 'Obeydallāh was minted in 358 at Hītīn (Ramla), of which he was governor (Lavon, Cat., 27/2, 64).

Three hundred and thirty years had passed since the Saracens first invaded the valley of the Nile. The people, with traditional docility, had liberally adopted the religion of their rulers, and the Muslims now formed the great majority of the population. Arabs and natives had blended into much the same race that we now call Egyptians; but so far the mixture had not produced any conspicuous men. The few commanding figures among the governors, Ibn-Tūlūn, the Ikhshid, Kāfir, were foreigners, and even these were but a step above the stereotyped official. They essayed no great extension of their dominions, they did not try to extinguish their dangerous neighbours, the schismatic Fatimids; and though they possessed and used fleets, they ventured upon no excursions against Europe. In material conditions it may be doubted whether the people gained anything by the Arab conquest. No doubt the old system of cultivation and irrigation went on, as it always has done—but it owed little to the enterprise or public spirit of the rulers, who left the irrigation and agriculture to take care of themselves, and were chiefly concerned in drawing the revenue. The decrease in the land-tax recorded by Maqrīzī faithfully reflects the carelessness of the governors. Their public works were almost wholly confined to the capital, which they enlarged and adorned with palaces and other buildings, gardens, and meydans, for their own pleasure. The luxury of such princes as Khumāravayh must have benighted the townspeople, for a time, at the expense of the country taxpayers. The courts of men like Ibn-Tūlūn and Kāfir attracted men of learning and polite letters from other parts of the caliphate, and Misr was gradually acquiring a reputation as a centre of enlightenment. But so far it was much behind Baghdad, Damascus, and Cordova; the Arshār university was not yet founded, nor had the Muslims of Egypt yet produced a poet historian, or critic of the first rank in Arabic literature. On the other hand, it must be remembered that historiography and literary criticism were still in a very crude stage of development in all parts of the Mohammadan dominions ; the celebrated Tabari, a contemporary of Khumāraweyh, had not risen above the mere collecting of traditions without attempting to co-ordinate or criticize them ; Mas'ū II who saw the Ikhshidid, was chiefly a collector of anecdotes and curiosities of history ; and the poets or versifiers of the caliphate were essentially an artificial product of the court, whose talents were best remunerated at the richest capital, or wherever fools and their money were most readily parted. The genuine poetry of the desert was no longer a living inspiration, but a classical tradition. The literature of erudition and compilation was only beginning.

CHAPTER IV

THE SHI'A REVOLUTION

969

Authorities.—‘Arīb el-Kurtubī, Ibn-el-Athīr, Ibn-Khallikān, Ibn-Khaldūn, el-Makrizī, Quatremère, Vie de l’apostol; Wustenfeld, Geschichte der fatimidischen Kalifate.

THE great revolution which sixty years before had swept over north Africa, and now spread to Egypt, arose out of the old controversy over the legitimacy of the caliphate. The prophet Muhammad died without definitely naming a successor, and thereby bequeathed an interminable quarrel to his followers. The principle of election, thus introduced, raised the first three caliphs, Abū-Bekr, ‘Omar, ‘Othmān, to the cathedra at Medina; but a strong minority held that the “divine right” rested with ‘Alī, the “Lion of God,” first convert to Islam, husband of the prophet’s daughter Fātīma, and father of Muhammad’s only male descendants. When ‘Alī in turn became the fourth caliph, he was the mark for jealousy, intrigue, and at length assassination; his sons, the grandsons of the prophet, were excluded from the succession; his family were cruelly persecuted by their successful rivals, the Omayyad usurpers; and the tragedy of Kerbela and the murder of Huseyn set the seal of martyrdom on the holy family and stirred a passionate enthusiasm which still rouses intense excitement in the annual representations of the Persian Passion Play.

The rent thus opened in Islam was never closed, and to this day the hatred between Sunnis and Shi'a, between the Popular Choice and the Divine Right, is more bitter than between Protestant and Catholic in the days of persecution. The ostracism of 'Ali "laid the foundation of the grand incurable schism which has divided the Mohammadan church, and equally destroyed the practice of charity among the members of their common creed and endangered the speculative truths of doctrine. Abroad, it necessarily hampered the propagation of the faith by the evidence which it afforded the unbeliever of the diversity of opinion, strife, and reciprocal maledictions of its professors themselves. At home, it placed the caliphs in so false a position that they presented the extraordinary spectacle of sovereign pontiffs who rendered their unjust claim to the crown still more palpably indefensible by persecuting the descendants of the author of their faith and founder of their throne, and who, to fill up the measure of inconsistency, were obliged publicly to invoke every blessing on that family by whose exclusion alone they enjoyed the privilege of performing the Akba. Thus it alienated the hearts of a large portion of the people from their spiritual and temporal head, sowed the ineradicable seeds of sedition, conspiracy, and rebellion, placed the usurper on a tottering throne from which the rightful claimant might at any time hurl him; and left him to rule a divided people with a broken sceptre."<sup>1</sup>

The history of the 'Alid schism, or of Shi'ism, may be read elsewhere;<sup>2</sup> here we can only take up the links that connect it with the conquest of Egypt by the Fatimids. The descendants of 'Ali, though almost universally devoid of the qualities of great leaders, possessed the persistence and devotion of martyrs, and their sufferings heightened the fanatical enthusiasm of their supporters. All attempts to recover the temporal power having proved vain, the 'Abds fell back upon the spiritual authority of the successive candidates of the holy family, whom they proclaimed to be the Imams or spiritual leaders of the faithful. This doctrine of the Imamate gradually acquired a more mystical meaning, supported by an allegorical interpretation of the Koran; and a mysterious influence was ascribed to the Imam, who, though hidden from mortal eye, on account of the persecution of his enemies, would soon come forward publicly in the character of the ever-expected Mahdi, sweep away the corruptions of the heretical caliphate, and revive the majesty of the pure lineage of the prophet. All Mohammadans believe in a coming Mahdi, a Messiah who shall restore right and prepare for the second advent of Mohammad and the tribunal of the last day; but the Shi'a turned the expectation to special account. They taught that the true Imam, though invisible to mortal sight, is ever living; they predicted the Mahdi's speedy appearance, and kept their adherents on the alert to take up arms in his service. With a view to his coming they organized a pervasive conspiracy, instituted a secret society with carefully graduated stages of initiation, used the doctrines of all religions and sects as weapons in the propaganda, and sent missionaries throughout the provinces of Islam to increase the numbers of the initiates, and pave the way for the great revolution. We see their partial success in the ravages of the Carmathians, who were the true parents of the Fatimids. The leaders and chief missionaries had really nothing in common with Mohammadanism. Among themselves they were frankly atheists. Their objects were political, and they used religion in any form, and adapted it in all modes, to secure proselytes, to whom they imparted only so much of their doctrine as they were able to bear. These men were furnished with "an armoury of proselytism" as perfect, perhaps, as any known to history: they had appeals to enthusiasm, and arguments for the reason, and "fuel for the fiercest passions of the people and times in which they moved." They combined indeed the intellectual dexterity and unscrupulousness ascribed to the Jesuit, with the talent for criminal organization of the Decisi. Their real aim was not religious or constructive, but pure nihilism. They used the claim of the family of 'Ali, not because they believed in any divine right or any caliphate, but because some flag had to be flourished in order to rouse the people.

<sup>1</sup> Nicholson, Hist. of Fat. Dyn., 7, 8.

<sup>2</sup> See, for example, Dozy, Hist. de l'Islamisme, trans. Chano, ch. ix.

One of these missionaries, disguised as a merchant, journeyed back to Barbary in 903 with some Berber pilgrims who had performed the sacred ceremonies at Mecca. He was welcomed by the great tribe of the Kitâma, and rapidly acquired an extraordinary influence over the Berbers—a race prone to superstition, and easily impressed by the mysterious rites of initiation and the emotional doctrines of the propagandist. The wrongs of the prophetic house, and the approaching triumph of the Mahdi. Barbary had never been much attached to the caliphate, and for a century it had been practically independent under the Aghlabid dynasty, the barbarous excesses of whose later sovereigns had alienated their subjects. Ames moreover, had established themselves, in the dynasty of the Idrîids, in Morocco since the end of the eighth century. The land was in every respect apt for revolution, and the success of Abu-'Abdallâh esh-Shî'î, the new missionary, was extraordinarily rapid. In a few years he had a following of 200,000 armed men, and after a series of battles he drove Ziyâdat-Allâh, the last Aghlabid prince, out of the country in 908. The missionary then proclaimed the Imâm 'Obeydallah as the true caliph and spiritual head of Islam. Whether this 'Obeydallah was really a descendant of 'Ali or not,<sup>1</sup> he had been carefully

<sup>1</sup> He was represented as the brother of the twelfth Imâm, who mysteriously vanished at Samârî ; or as the son of one of the "hidden" Imâms, who (according to the Ismâ'îlîs) succeeded to the direction of the religion after the death of the seventh Imâm. But there were at least eight different pedigrees provided for 'Obeydallah, and this discrepancy among his own supporters is a strong argument against his pretended descent from 'Ali and the other Imâms, especially in view of the pride and care with which the Arabs preserved their genealogies. The opponents of the Fâtiûds (or 'Obeydâds as they prefer to call them), on the other hand, asserted that 'Obeydallah's real name was Sa'îd; some said he was a Jew, and they traced his descent, or that of his adoptive father, to a Persian eye-doctor of Jewish views. Arab historians are sharply divided on this point, but their opinions are partly biased by religious and political influences. El-Mâkrîzî and Itâ-Khâlidîn are the most noted supporters of the prepared for the rôle, and reached Barbary in disguise with the greatest mystery and some difficulty, pursued by the suspicions of the Rāghidid caliph, who, in great alarm, sent repeated orders for his arrest. Indeed, the victorious missionary had to rescue his spiritual chief from a sordid prison at Sigilmāsa. Then humbly prostrating himself before him, he hailed him as the expected Mahdi, and in January, 910, he was duly prayed for in the mosque of Kairawān as "the Imām 'Obeydallāh al-Mahdi, commander of the faithful." The missionary's Berber proselytes were too numerous to encourage resistance, and the few who indulged the luxury of conscientious scruples were killed or imprisoned. El-Mahdi, indeed, appeared so secure in power that he excited the jealousy of his discoverer, Abū-'Abdallāh the missionary now found himself noboddy, where a month before he had been supreme. The Fātimid restoration was to him only a means to an end; he had used 'Obeydallāh's title as an engine of revolution, intending to proceed to the furthest lengths of his philosophy, to a complete social and political anarchy, the destruction of Islam, community of lands and women, and all the delight of unshackled licence. Instead of this, his creature had absorbed his power, and all such designs were void. He began to hatch treason and to hint doubts as to the genuineness of the Mahdi, who, as he truly represented, according to prophecy ought to work miracles and show other proofs of his divine mission. People began to ask for a "sign." In reply, the Mahdi had the missionary murdered.

The first Fātimid caliph, though without experience, was so vigorous a ruler that he could dispense with the dangerous support of his discoverer. He held the throne for a quarter of a century and established his authority, more or less continuously, over the Arab and Berber tribes and settled cities from the frontier of Egypt to the province of Fez (Fes) in Morocco, received the allegiance of the Mohammadan governor of Sicily, and twice despatched expeditions into Egypt, which he would probably have permanently conquered if he had not been hampered by perpetual insurrections in Barbary. Dicant governors and often whole tribes of Berbers, were constantly in revolt, and the disastrous famine of 928-9, coupled with the Asiatic plague which his troops had brought back with them from Egypt, led to general disturbances and insurrections which fully occupied the later years of his reign. The western provinces, from Tahert and Nakur to Fez and beyond, frequently threw off all show of allegiance. His authority was founded more on fear than on religious enthusiasm, though zeal for the 'Ahd cause had its share in his original success. The new "Eastern doctrines," as they were called, were enforced at the sword's point, and frightful examples were made of those who ventured to tread in the old paths. Nor were the free-thinkers of the large towns, who shared the missionary's exoteric principles, encouraged; for outwardly, at least, the Mahdi was strictly a Muslim. When people at Kairawan began to put in practice the missionary's advanced theories, to scoff at all the rules of Islam, to indulge in free love, pig's flesh, and wine, they were sternly brought to order. The mysterious powers expected of a Mahdi were sedulously rumoured among the credulous Berbers, though no miracles were actually exhibited; and the obedience of the conquered provinces was secured by horrible outrages and atrocities, of which the terrified people dared not provoke a repetition at the hands of the Mahdi's savage generals.

legitimacy of the Fātimid 'Obeydallāh whilst G'emmāl-ed-Dīn of Aleppo, Ibn-khalīlīn, al-Mekīn, Abū-l-Fidā, al-Suyūtī, Abū-l-Mihsān, among others, regard him as an imposter. Of European scholars, de Sacy adopted the former, and Quatremère the latter view.

His eldest son Abu-l-Kasim, who had twice led expeditions into Egypt, succeeded to the caliphate with the title of el-Kaim (924-946). He began his reign with warlike vigour. He sent out a fleet in 934 or 935, which harried the southern coast of France, blockaded and took Genoa, and coasted along Calabria, massacring and plundering, burning the shipping, and carrying off slaves wherever it touched. At the same time he despatched a third army against Egypt; but the firm hand of the Ikhshid now held the government, and his brother 'Obeydallah, with 15,000 horse, drove the enemy out of Alexandria and gave them a crushing defeat on their way home. But for the greater part of his reign el-Kāim was on the defensive, fighting for existence against the usurpation of one Abū-Yezid, a 10 repudiated Shi'ism, cursed the Mahdi and his successor, stirred up most of Moxien and Barbary against el-Kāim, drove him out of his capital, and went near to putting an end to the Fatimid Caliphate. It was only after seven years of uninterrupted civil war that this formidable insurrection died out, under the firm but politic management of the third Caliph, el-Manṣūr (946-953), a brave man who knew both when to strike and when to be generous. Abū-Yezid was at last run to earth, and his body was skinned and stuffed with straw, and exposed in a cage with a couple of ludicrous apes as a warning to the disaffected.

The Fatimids so far wear a brutal and barbarous character. They do not seem to have encouraged literature or learning, but this is partly explained by the fact that culture belonged chiefly to the orthodox caliphate, and its learned men could have no dealings with the heretical pretender. The city of Kayravān, which dates from the Arab conquest in the eighth century, preserves the remains of some noble buildings, but of their other capitals or royal residences, el-Mahdiya (founded 913-918), e.. Mohammadiya (914), and el-Manṣūriya (the ancient Sabra, restored and renamed in 948) —the last two being merely suburbs of Kayravān—no traces of art or architecture remain to bear witness to the taste of their founders. Each began to decay as soon as its successor was built.

With the fourth caliph, however, el-Mo'izz,<sup>1</sup> the conqueror of Egypt (933-975), the Fatimids entered upon a new phase. He was a man of politic temper, a born statesman, able to grasp the conditions of success, and to take advantage of every point in his favour. He was also highly educated, and not only wrote Arabic poetry and delighted in its literature, but studied Greek, mastered Berber and Sūdāni dialects, and is even said to have taught himself Slavonic, in order to converse with his slaves from eastern Europe. His eloquence was such as to move his audience to tears. To prudent statesmanship he added a large generosity, and his love of justice was among his noblest qualities. So far as outward acts could show, he was a strict Muslim of the Shī'a sect, and the statement of his adversaries that he was really at heart an atheist seems to rest merely upon the belief that all the Fatimids adopted the esoteric doctrines of the Ismā'īlian missionaries.

<sup>1</sup> His full name and title was the Imām Abū-Talib Ma'add, el-Mo'izz-ibn-Umar (fortifier of the religion of God). Coins of Mo'izz are fairly numerous, struck at el-Mahdiya and el-Manṣūriya, and Sicily; and, after the conquest, at Acre (Fustat) from A.H. 358 (969), Fustat (Kairouan) from 359, Tyre, 361, and Tripoli, 364 (974-5). A unique coin in the Khedivial Library at Cairo bears the usual inscriptions of

When he ascended the throne in April, 943, he had already a policy, and he lost no time in carrying it into execution. He first made a progress through his dominions, visiting each town, investigating its needs, and providing for its peace and prosperity. He bearded the rebels in their mountain fastnesses, till they laid down their arms and fell at his feet. He conciliated the chiefs and governors with presents and appointments, and was rewarded by their loyalty. At the head of his ministers he set G'awhar "the Roman," a slave from the eastern empire, who had risen to the post of secretary to the late caliph, and was now by his son promoted to the rank of wazir and commander of the forces. He was sent in 958 to bring the ever-refractory Maghrib (Morocco) to allegiance. The expedition was entirely successful, Sijilmāsa and Fex were taken, and G'awhar reached the shore of the Atlantic. Jars of live fish and seaweed reached the capital, and proved to the caliph that his empire touched the ocean, the limitless limit of the world. All the African littoral, from the Atlantic to the frontier of Egypt (with the single exception of Spanish Ceuta), now peacefully admitted the sway of the Fatimid caliph.

Mo'izz and the date Muṣr, A.H. 341, the year of his accession. As there was no expedition into Egypt that year, this coin must either record a pretension—anticipating the conquest of nine eighteen years later—or present an engraver's error.

The result was due partly to the exhaustion caused by the long struggle during the preceding reign, partly to the politic concessions and personal influence of the able young ruler. He was liberal and conciliatory towards distant provinces, but to the Arabs of the capital he was severe. Cairo teemed with disaffected folk, sheikhs and theologians bitterly hostile to the heretical "orientalism" of the Fatimids, and always ready to excite a tumult. Moizz was resolved to give them no chance, and one of his repressive measures was the curfew. At sunset a trumpet sounded, and anyone found abroad after that was liable to lose not only his way but his head. So long as they were quiet, however, he used the people gently, and sought to impress them in his favour. In a singular interview (recorded by Mahrizi) he exhibited himself to a deputation of sheikhs, dressed in the utmost simplicity, and seated before his writing materials in a plain room, surrounded by books. He wished to disabuse them of the idea that he led in private a life of luxury and self-indulgence. "You see what employs me when I am alone," he said; "I read letters that come to me from the lands of the east and the west, and answer them with my own hand. I deny myself all the pleasures of the world, and I seek only to protect your lives, multiply your children, shame your rivals and daunt your enemies." Then he gave them much good advice, and especially recommended them to keep to one wife: "One woman is enough for one man. If you strictly observe what I have ordained," he concluded, "I trust that God will through you procure our conquest of the East in like manner as he has vouchsafed us the West."

[The conquest of Egypt was indeed the aim of his life.] To rule over tumultuous Arab and Berber tribes in a poor country formed no fit ambition for a man of his capacity. Egypt, its wealth, its commerce, its great port, and its docile population—these were his dream.

For two years he had been digging wells and building rest-houses on the road to Alexandria. The west was now outwardly quiet, and between Egypt and any hope of succour from the eastern caliphate stood the ravaging armies of the Karmatis. Egypt itself was in helpless disorder. The great Kalifūr was dead, and its nominal ruler was a child. Ibn-Furāt, the wezir, had made himself obnoxious to the people by arrests and extortions. The very soldiery was in revolt, and the Turkish retainers of the court mutinied, plundered the wezir's palace, and even opened negotiations with Mo'izz. Ḥosayn, the nephew of the Ikhsud, attempted to restore public order, but after three months of vacillating and unpopular government he returned to his own province in Palestine to make terms with the Karmatis. Famine, the result of the exceptionally low Nile of 967, added to the misery of the country, plague, as usual, followed in the steps of famine, over six hundred thousand people died in and around Iusṭaq, and the wretched inhabitants began in despair to migrate to happier lands.

All these matters were fully reported to Mo'izz by the <sup>66</sup> renegade Jew Ya'kub b. Killis, a former favourite of Kalifūr, who had been driven from Egypt by the jealous exactions of the wezir Ibn-Furāt, and who was perfectly familiar with the political and financial state of the Nile valley. His representations confirmed the Fatimid caliph's resolve; the Arab tribes were summoned to his standard; an immense treasure was collected—24,000,000 D. in gold according to Makrizi, all of which was spent in the campaign—gratuities were lavishly distributed to the army; and at the head of over 100,000 men, all well mounted and armed, accompanied by a thousand camels and a mob of horses carrying money, stores, and ammunition, G'awhar marched from Kayrawan in February, 969. The caliph himself reviewed the troops. The marshal kissed his hand and his horse's shoe. All the princes, emirs, and courtiers passed reverently on foot before the honoured leader of the conquering army, who, as a last proof of favour, received the gird of his master's own robes and charger. The governors of all the towns on the route had orders to come on foot to G'awhar's stirrup, and one of them vainly offered a large bribe to be excused the indignity.

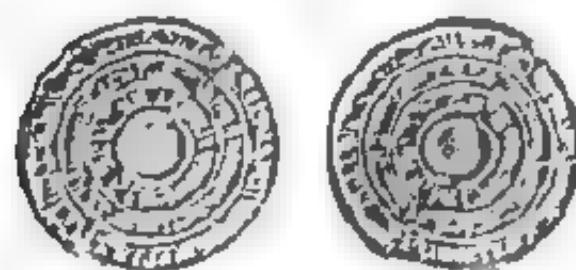

Fig. 20.—Dinar of al-Mo'izz, M.A.H. 969.

The approach of this overwhelming force filled the Egyptian ministers with consternation, and they thought only of obtaining favourable terms. A deputation of notables, headed by Abū-G'āfar Muslim, a shérif (or descendant of the Prophet's family), waited upon G'awhar near Alexandria, and demanded a capitulation. The general consented without reserve, and in a conciliatory letter granted all they asked. But they had reckoned without their host, the troops at Fusṭāt would not listen to such humiliation, and there was a strong war party among the citizens, to which some of the ministers leaned. The city prepared for resistance, and skirmishes took place with G'awhar's army, which had meanwhile arrived at the opposite town of Gīza in July. Forcing the passage of the river, with the help of some boats supplied by Egyptian soldiers, the invaders fell upon the opposing army drawn up on the other bank, and totally defeated them. The troops deserted Fusṭāt in a panic, and the women of the city, running out of their houses, implored the shérif to intercede with the conqueror. G'awhar, like his master, always disposed to a politic leniency, renewed his former promises, and granted a complete amnesty to all who submitted. The overjoyed populace cut off the heads of some of the refractory leaders in their enthusiasm, and sent them to the camp in pleasing token of allegiance. A herald bearing a white flag rode through the streets of Fusṭāt proclaiming the amnesty and forbidding pillage, and on August 5 the Fātimid army, with full pomp of drums and banners, entered the capital.

That very night Gawhar laid the foundations of a new city, or rather fortified palace, destined for the reception of his sovereign. He was encamped on the sandy waste which stretched north-east of Fustat on the road to Heliopolis, and there, at a distance of about a mile from the river, he marked out the boundaries of the new capital. There were no buildings, save the old "Convent of the Bones," nor any cultivation except the beautiful park called "Kasr's Garden," to obstruct his plans. A square, somewhat less than a mile each way, was pegged out with poles, and the Maghraoi astrologers, in whom Muizz reposed extravagant faith, consulted together to determine the auspicious moment for the opening ceremony. Bells were hung on ropes from pole to pole, and at the signal of the sages their ringing was to announce the precise moment when the labourers were to turn the first sod. The calculations of the astrologers were, however, anticipated by a raven, who perched on one of the ropes and set the bells jingling, upon which every mattock was struck into the earth and the trenches were opened. It was an unlucky hour : the planet Mars (el-Kahir) was in the ascendant ; but it could not be undone, and the place was accordingly named after the hostile planet, el-Kâhirah, "the martial" or "triumphant," in the hope that the sinister omen might be turned to a triumphant issue.<sup>1</sup> Cairo, as Kâhirah has come to be called, may fairly be said to have outlived all astrological prejudices. The name of the 'Abbasid caliph was at once expunged from the Friday prayers at the old mosque of 'Amr at Fustat, the black 'Abbasid robes were proscribed, and the preacher, in pure white, recited the khutba for the Imām Mo'izz, emir el-murminin, and invoked blessings on his ancestors, 'Ali and Fātima, and all their holy family. The call to prayer from the minarets was adapted to Shi'a taste. The joyful news was sent to the Fatimid caliph on swift dromedaries, together with the heads of the slain. Coins were struck with the special formulas of the Fatimid creed—"All is the noblest of [God's] delegates, the wear of the best of apostles"; "the Imām Ma'add calls men to profess the unity of the Eternal"—in addition to the usual dogmas of the Mohammadan faith. For two centuries the mosques and the mint proclaimed the shibboleth of the Shi'a.

<sup>1</sup> Maqrîzî, L. 384, adds that el-Kâhirah was also named el-Manṣûrah (probably after the city or suburb of Kayrawân built by the Fatimid al-Mansûr, see Lane's Cairo, 234). The name of el-Kâhirah appears first on a coin in A.H. 301 (cong.4), with the epithet of Mâkra, "the guarded"; but does not recur until more than a century later, A.H. 408–14, when it has the form of Mâkra al-Kâhirah, "the triumphate city of Mu'âwiya." The rare occurrence of the name is explained by the name of the metropolis being still worked, as before, at Fustat. After the burning of Fustat in 1168 and the accession of Salâhu'l-Dîn, the coinage regularly bears the name of el-Kâhirah (Cairo).

- Gāwīl al-ṣāfi set himself at once to restore tranquillity and alleviate the sufferings of the famine-stricken people. Mo'izz had prudently sent grain-ships to relieve their distress, and as the price of bread nevertheless remained at famine rates, Gāwīl publicly flogged the rulers, established a central corn-exchange, and compelled everyone to sell his corn there under the eye of a government inspector (mukhtasib). In spite of his efforts, the famine lasted for two years; plague spread alarmingly, insomuch that the corpses could not be buried fast enough, and were thrown into the Nile; and it was not till the winter of 971-2 that plenty returned and the pest disappeared. As usual, the viceroy took a personal part in all public functions. Every Saturday he sat in court, assisted by the wazīr, Ibn-Furāt, the ḫādī, and skilled lawyers, to hear causes and petitions, and to administer justice. To secure impartiality, he appointed to every department of state an Egyptian and a Maghribi officer. His firm and equitable rule ensured peace and order; and the great palace he was building, and the new mosque, the Athar, which he founded in 970 and finished in 972, not only added to the beauty of the capital, but gave employment to innumerable craftsmen.

The inhabitants of Egypt accepted the new régime with their habitual phlegm. An Ikhshidi officer in the Bashmār district of Lower Egypt did, indeed, incite the people to rebellion, but his fate was not such as to encourage others. He was chased out of Egypt, captured on the coast of Palestine, and then, it is gravely recorded, he was given sesame oil to drink for a month, till his skin stripped off, whereupon it was stuffed with straw and hung up on a beam, as a reminder to him who would be admonished. With this brief exception we read of no riots, no sectarian risings, and the general surrender was complete when the remaining partisans of the deposed dynasty, to the number of 4000, laid down their arms. An embassy sent to George, king of Nubia to invite him to embrace Islam, and to exact the customary tribute, was received with courtesy, and the money, but not the conversion, was arranged. The holy cities of Mekka and Medina in the Higâz, where the gold of Moâz had been prudently distributed some years before, responded to his generosity and success by proclaiming his supremacy in the mosques; the Hamidid prince in the northern Syria paid similar homage to the Fatimid caliph at Alepo, where the 'Abâdis had hitherto been recognized. Southern Syria, however, which had formed part of the Ikhshid's kingdom did not submit to the usurpers without a struggle. Huseyn was still independent at Ramia and Gâwîlî's lieutenant, Gâttar b Felâb, was obliged to give him battle. Huseyn was defeated and exposed bareheaded to the insults of the mob at Fusat, to be finally sent, with the rest of the family of Ikhshid, to a Barbary gaol. Damascus, the home of orthodoxy, was taken by Gâttar, not without a struggle, and the Fatimid doctrine was there published, to the indignation and disgust of the Sunni population.

A worse plague than the Fatimid conquest soon afflicted Syria. The Karmati leader, Hasan b Ahmad, surnamed el-A'sam, finding the blackmail, which he had lately received out of the revenues of Damascus, suddenly stopped, resolved to extort it by force of arms. The Fatimids indeed sprang from the same movement, and their founder professed the same political and irreligious philosophy as Hasan himself; but this did not stand in his way, and his knowledge of their origin made him the less disposed to render homage to the sacred pretensions of the new Imâms, whom he contemptuously designated.

as the spawn of the quack, charlatans, and enemies of Islam. He tried to enlist the support of the 'Abbasid caliph, but al-Mu'tṣim replied that Fāṭimis and Karmatis were all one to him, and he would have nothing to do with either. The Buwayhid prince of Irāk, however, supplied Hasan with arms and money: Abū-Taghlib, the Hamdānid ruler of Rābba on the Euphrates, contributed men; and, supported by the Arab tribes of 'Okeyl, Tāyy, and others, Hasan marched upon Damascus, where the Fāṭimids were routed, and their general, Gā'far, killed. Mo'izz was forthwith publicly cursed from the pulpit in the Syrian capital, to the qualified satisfaction of the inhabitants, who had to pay handsomely for the pleasure.

Hasan next marched to Ramla, and thence, leaving the Fāṭimid army of 11,000 men shut up in Jaffa, invaded Egypt. His troops surprised Kulzum at the head of the Red Sea, and Faramā (Pelusium) near the Mediterranean, at the two ends of the Egyptian frontier; Tinnis declared against the Fāṭimids, and Hasan appeared at Heliopolis ('Ain Shems) in October, 971. Gā'whar had already entrenched the new capital with a deep ditch, leaving but one entrance, which he closed with an iron gate. He armed the Egyptians, as well as the African troops, and a spy was set to watch the wazīr Ibn-Furāt, lest he should indulge in treachery. The sherifs of the family of 'All were summoned to the camp, as hostages for the good behaviour of the inhabitants. Meanwhile, the officers of the enemy were liberally tempted with bribes. Two months they lay before Cairo, and then, after an indecisive engagement, Hasan stormed the gate, forced his way across the ditch, and attacked the Egyptians on their own ground. The result was a severe repulse, and Hasan retreated under cover of night to Kulzum, leaving his camp and baggage to be plundered by the Fāṭimids, who were only balked of a sanguinary pursuit.

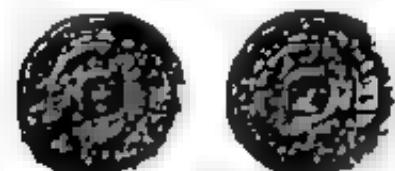

Fig. 21.—A Dinar of el-Mo'izz,
Palestine, 974.

by the intervention of night. The Egyptian volunteers displayed unexpected valour in the fight, and many of the partisans of the late dynasty, who were with the enemy, were made prisoners. Thus the serious danger, which went near to cutting short the Fâtimid occupation of Egypt, was not only resolutely met, but even turned into an advantage. There was no more intriguing on behalf of the Ikhshîkhs; Tinnis was recovered from its temporary defection and occupied by the reinforcements which Mo'izz had hurriedly despatched under Ibn-'Ammâr to the succour of Gâwhar; and the Karmâl fleet, which attempted to recover this fort, was obliged to slip anchor, abandoning seven ships and 300 prisoners. Jaffâ, which still held out resolutely against the besieging Arabs, was now relieved by the despatch of African troops from Cairo, who brought back the garrison, but did not dare to hold the post. The enemy fell back upon Damascus, and their leaders fell out among themselves.

The Karmâl chief was not crushed, however, by his defeat: in the following year he was collecting ships and Arabs for a fresh invasion. Gâwhar, who had long urged his master to come and protect his conquest, now pointed out the extreme danger of a second attack from an enemy which had already succeeded in boldly forcing his way to the gate of Cairo. Mo'izz had delayed his journey, because he could not safely trust his western provinces in his absence; but on the receipt of this grave news, he appointed Yûsuf Bulûgîn b. Zeyrî, of the Berber tribe of Sanhîga, to act as his deputy in Barbary, left Sardânîva—the Fontainebleau of Kayrawân, as Mansûriya was its Versailles—in November, 972, and making a leisurely progress, by way of Kâbis, Tripolis, Agdâbiya, and Barka, reached Alexandria in the following May. Here the caliph received a deputation, consisting of the îadi of Fustât and other eminent persons, whom he moved to tears by his eloquent and virtuous discourse. A month later he was encamped in the gardens of the monastery near Gîza, where he was reverently welcomed by his devoted servant, Gawhar, content to efface himself in his master's shadow.<sup>1</sup>

The entry of the new caliph into his new capital was a solemn spectacle. With him were all his sons and brothers and kinsfolk, and before him were borne the coffins of his ancestors. Fustat was illuminated and decked for his reception : but Mo'izz would not enter the old capital of the usurping caliphs. He crossed from Ruda by Gawhar's new bridge, and proceeded direct to the palace-city of Cairo. Here he threw himself on his face and gave thanks to God.

There was yet an ordeal to be gone through before he could regard himself as safe. Egypt was the home of many undoubted sherifs or descendants of 'Ali, and these, headed by a representative of the distinguished Tabataba family, came boldly to examine his credentials. Mo'izz must prove his title to the holy Imamate inherited from 'Ali, to the satisfaction of these experts in genealogy. According to the story, the caliph called a great assembly of the people, and invited the sherifs to appear : then, half drawing his sword, he said, "Here is my pedigree," and scattering gold among the spectators, added, "and there is my proof." It was perhaps the best argument he could produce. The sherifs could only protest their entire satisfaction at this convincing evidence ; and it is at any rate certain that, whatever they thought of the caliph's claim, they did not contest it. The capital was placarded with his name and the praises of 'Ali, and Mo'izz was acclaimed by the people, who flocked to his first public audience. Among the presents offered him, that of Gawhar was especially splendid, and its costliness prepares one for the coming records of the colossal wealth of the Fatimids. It included 500 horses with saddles and bridles encrusted with gold, amber, and precious stones : tents of silk and cloth of gold, borne on Bactrian camels; dromedaries, mules, and camels of burcen; tiligree caskets full of gold and silver vessels; gold-mounted swords; caskets of chased silver containing precious stones, a turban set with jewels, and 900 boxes filled with samples of all the goods that Egypt produced.

<sup>1</sup> Gawhar appears to have taken no conspicuous part in the government or campaigns after the arrival of Mo'izz, and in Oct., 974, he was deprived of all his appointments. No quarrel is recorded, but Mo'izz probably felt that even perfect loyalty may not always counterbalance a dangerous popularity. We hear of the great kāfi (general) again in the next reign.

On the day of the 'Id, or festival after the fast (the <sup>111</sup> Turkish Burani), the caliph himself performed the prayers at the head of the congregation of the people, and then delivered the khatib from the pulpit. He vauced himself on his sacerdotal talents, and his oration on this occasion touched all hearts. When the ceremony was over, Mo'izz returned to the palace at the head of his troops, escorted by his four sons in armour, preceded by two elephants, and gave a banquet to his guests. This palace, almost a city, the nucleus of the modern Cairo was built, as we have seen, at some little distance from the old capital Fustat, and, though sometimes called al-Madina, 'the city,' was really an immense royal castle, reserved exclusively for the use of the caliph and his multitudinous harim and household, his guard, his choice regiments, and his government officers. The broad enclosure of the castle was forbidden ground to the public, and even ambassadors from foreign powers—the eastern emperor had sent envoys to Gawhar and also to Mo'izz—were required to dismount outside and were led into the presence between guards in the same manner as at the Byzantine and Ottoman courts. The chief buildings were the Great East Palace (or Palace of Mo'izz), the caliph's personal residence, where he kept his women, children, slaves, eunuchs, and servants, estimated at from eighteen to thirty thousand in number; and the Lesser West Palace, or pleasure-house, which opened on the spacious garden of Kifâr, where a meydan or hippodrome provided exercise for the court. The two were separated by the square called 'Betwixt the Palaces' (Beyn-el-Kasreyn), where as many as ten thousand troops could parade; the name is still preserved in part of the Suk-on-Nakhâsin or Coppersmiths' Market.

An underground passage connected the two palaces, by which the caliph could pass without violating that mysterious seclusion which was part of his sacred character. Hard by were the mausoleum where lay the bones of his Fatimid ancestors, brought from far Kayrawān, and the mosque, el-Azhar, where the caliph was wont to lead the Friday prayers as Prince and Preceptor of the Faithful.

"Of the size and splendour of the Great Palace the Arabic historians speak with bated breath. We read of four thousand chambers;—of the Golden Gate which opened to the Golden Hall, a gorgeous pavilion where the caliph, seated on his golden throne, surrounded by his chamberlains and gentlemen in waiting (generally Greeks or Sodānis), surveyed from behind a screen of golden filigree the festivals of Islām;—of the Emerald Hall with its beautiful pillars of marble;—the Great Divan, where he sat on Mondays and Thursdays at a window beneath a cupola;—and the Porch where he listened every evening while the oppressed and wronged came below and cried the ende of the Shi'a till he heard their griefs and gave redress."<sup>1</sup>

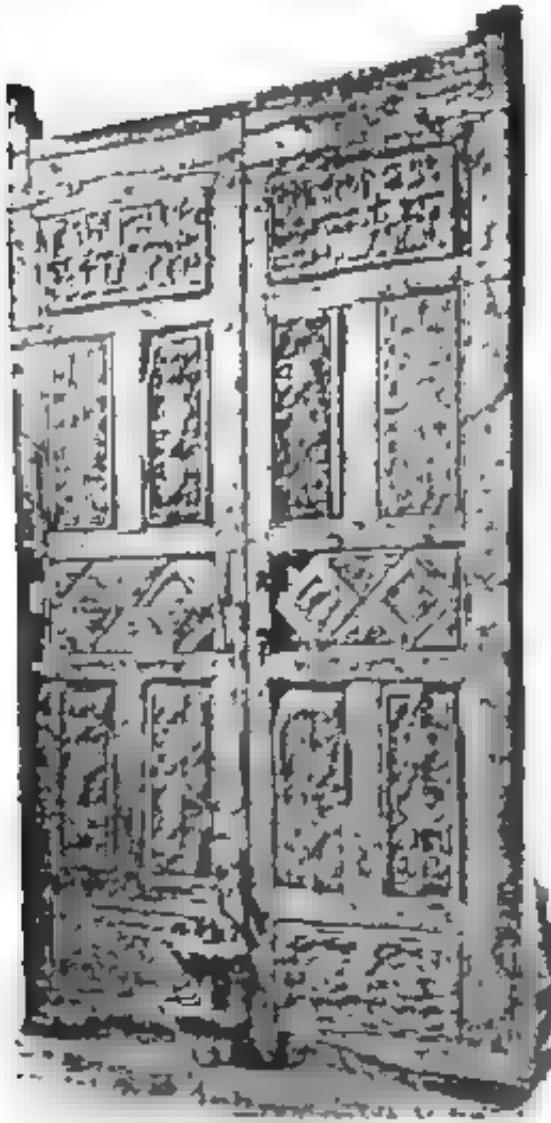

Fig. 22.—Door of el-Azhar mosque, 972.

Digitized by Google

This description applies to the Fātimid Palace of later times, but it is true in the main of the Kālura of Mo'izz. The buildings had all been planned by himself, to the smallest detail, and Gāwhar had laboured for more than three years to realize his sovereign's designs. The profusion of wealth and costly magnificence of the court may be gathered from many indications. One of the daughters of Mo'izz left at her death five sacks of emeralds and a prodigious amount of precious stones of all sorts, 2,000 chased and inlaid silver vessels, 20,000 pieces of Sicilian embroidery, and 60 basins and ewers of pure crystal; forty pounds of wax were used in sealing her rooms and chests. Another daughter died worth 2,500,000*D.*, and left 12,000 different dresses. His wife built a mosque in the Kālura, and lavished large sums on its decoration: a Persian architect designed it, and artists from Bayrā painted the ceilings and walls. Mo'izz himself commanded a piece of silk to be made at Tustar in Persia, representing in gold and colours a map of the world which cost him 22,000*D.* If the Fātimid heresy discouraged learning and literature, it stimulated art; and the prejudice against the representation of living things, which cramped orthodox painters, did not influence the work of the schismatics, who readily adopted Persian ideas. The Fātimid wazīr el-Yāzūrī (see p. 142) pitted two painters of 'Irāq against each other: one, el-Kādir, painted a dancing girl in white dress, who seemed to retreat within a black arch, and his rival Ibn-'Atīz made his girl in crimson appear to come out of the yellow arch behind her.<sup>2</sup> Such a design would not have been tolerated by an 'Abbāsid caliph. There is no doubt that great artistic activity prevailed under the Fātimid rule, which was developed in Sicily as well as in Egypt. The famous Bayeux ivory casket, with its chased silver inlay represeating parrots and other birds, has a Fatimid inscription, and an ivory box dated 970, in the Victoria and Albert Museum, is probably due to their workmen. A rock crystal vase in the treasury of St. Mark at Venice bears the name of el-Aziz, the son of Mu'izz. Pottery, with metallic lustre, and glass, were worked, and the looms of Egypt were renowned. Alexandria and Cairo manufactured silks so fine that a whole robe could be passed through a finger ring. Asyūq was famous for its woolen turban cloth, Behnesa for white woollens. Debik for silks, Damietta, of course, for dimity; and at Tiniss, where the products of the royal factory were wholly reserved for the Fatimid household, they made besides canbrick the beautiful iridescent stuff called fatulamur, or "chameleon," used for royal saddle cloths and litters. Besides native manufactures, the artistic work of Persia, Asia Minor, and Sicily was in high demand in Cairo.

<sup>1</sup> Lane-Poole, Life of Saladin, 112-114.

<sup>2</sup> Maqrīzī, Kāssat. Cp. Lane-Poole, Art of the Saracens in Egypt, 9, 26, 163, 201, 241.

Mu'izz, however, was no sabbirite, and he combined with a love of beautiful things a watchful alertness to the preservation and development of his power. He had inherited a fleet in Sicily, which raided the coast of Spain in 935 and brought away booty and prisoners. The caliph of Cordova, the great Nasir, retorted by sending his ships to Tunis, where they had burnt a small port near Bona and ravaged the Barbary coast. The possession of the Egyptian harbours led to larger naval plans. A dock was built at Maṣṣ, the predecessor of Būqāk as port of Cairo, and six hundred ships were built there—the largest fleet Egypt had seen since the Arab conquest.<sup>1</sup> The army was carefully maintained in a high state of efficiency, nor did the caliph neglect any means to win the esteem of his new subjects. His tribunals were renowned for equity, he took a personal interest in all details of administration, proclaimed the height of the inundation as registered in the Nilometers, presided over the cutting of the Cairo khālig or canal, and delighted the people by the splendid gold-embroidered silk covering (shemsiya) which he prepared for the Ka'ba at Mekka, and which all the world was admitted to see on the Feast of Sacrifice. It was four times as big as any cover ordered by the 'Abbasids, or even by Kâfir. Evidently, the people thought, this caliph was a model of magnificent piety.

<sup>1</sup> See below, p. 121, note.

Meanwhile the threatened invasion of the Karmatis still lingered. They had made an attempt upon Tumâl, which failed, but no farther movements had taken place. Mo'izz endeavoured to negotiate with their chief, but in reply to a conciliatory epistle Hasan merely wrote:— "From Hasan b. Ahmad el A'sam. I have received thy letter, full of words, but empty of sense. I will bring my answer." He was as good as his word, and in the spring of 974 the Karmatis appeared again at Heliopolis, and then, joined by partisans of the Ikhshidids and by rival 'Abds, spread over all parts of Egypt in a wave of devastation. Mo'izz was prepared for them, but his forces were unequal to the defence. His son 'Abdallah with 4,000 men had some successful engagements with scattered bodies of the enemy in the delta, but could not prevent the main body closing upon Cairo, where they drove the defenders over the trench into "the city."<sup>1</sup> Pent up within the walls, the caliph's troops were unable to make head against the Arabs, until Mo'izz contrived to bribe the chief of the Benb-Tayy, the strongest ally of the Karmatis, with 100,000 D., manufactured for the purpose of lead, gilt, since there was not enough gold in the treasury. The treacherous Bedawi deserted his leader in the next battle; Hasan was forced to fly, his camp was taken and plundered, and 1,500 of his camp followers were massacred. Ten thousand men were soon despatched into Syria, where the Karmatis were fortunately weakened by the jealousies of their two leaders, one of whom delivered the other into the hands of the Fâtimid, who put him and his son in wooden cages and sent them to Egypt. The Karmati plague was stayed, but Damascus was a prey to faction and disorder for some years. The eunuch Rayân, who had conquered Tripolis from the Romans for Mo'izz, and was now sent to Damascus, was unable to hold the city against the Turkish emir Aftegin, who restored the name of the 'Abbasid caliph, and gave the Syrian capital and the surrounding province some measure of peace and good government. Meanwhile another eunuch had taken Beirut with the Fatimid troops, and this loss brought Tzimisches to Syria. Aftegin at once paid him homage and made a treaty : but Rayan sallied out of Tripolis and administered a crushing defeat, and the Roman retreated.

1

The news of this victory and the tidings that his name was again recited in the prayers at Alekka and Medina heightened the last days of the caliph Mo'izz, who died about Christ 1075, in his forty sixth year.<sup>1</sup> His two years' residence at Cairo had been marked by many reforms. He had appointed the Jew Ibn-Killis and Asbag as general land administrators, and abolished at one stroke the petty powers and profits of the collectors and farmers of the taxes. These two officers sat daily in the office of the emirate, adjoining the mosque of Ibn-Juhan, fixing the tithes and assessments of lands, and superintending the taxes, customs, tithes, poll-tax, wakfi, and all branches of revenue, calling up arrears, and examining scrupulously all complaints and demands. The result was a large increase in revenue. All taxes had to be paid in the current Fatimid coinage, and the Mellezi dinar, reckoned at 12½ dirhems, completely ousted the 'Abbasid dinar of the Ikhshidids, to the considerable loss of the inhabitants. The taxes moreover were collected rigorously, for Mo'izz was eager to recover the immense sum he had spent on the conquest of Egypt, which so far had not answered his expectations of a gold mine. Nevertheless, in a single day the taxes at Fustat amounted to 20,000*D.*, and sometimes as much as 100,000*D.*; and once Tinnis, Damietta, and Ushmuneyn contributed 200,000*D.* in a day.

In his brief management of his mixed subjects in Egypt Mo'izz displayed judgment and justice. He forbade his <sup>1</sup> His eldest son 'Abdalilh predeceased him by about a year, but three sons, Atsar, Taimur, and 'Okeyl, with seven daughters, survived.

African troops to interfere with the residents in the capital, and settled them at el-Khandak, near Heliopolis, to prevent broils. They could not be kept out of Fustat by day, but every evening a crier went round to warn them to leave the city before dark. To the Copts Mo'izz was not ill-disposed, and one of them was appointed to the head of the customs, first in Egypt and afterwards in Palestine, and was held in high favour by the caliph. Indeed the only sectarian trouble he had was of his own importing. The Shi'a were naturally much set up by the Fatimid successes, and they celebrated the martyrdom of Hoseyn on the 10th of Moharram—a day dreaded by the police even now in Bombay—with unwanted publicity at Cairo in 973, visited the tombs of the lady Nefisa and Kulthum, of the holy family, in vast crowds, and insulted the Sunni shop-people in the exuberance of their zeal. Street fights were prevented by the timely closing of the gates which separated the various quarters. The incident shows that the Shi'a revolution was still resented by a considerable section of the population, and we shall see that even two centuries later the restoration of orthodoxy was effected with surprising unanimity.

THE ALLEGED DESCENT OF THE FĀTIMID CALIPHS FROM THE PROPHET MUHAMMAD

CHAPTER V

THE FĀTIMID CALIPHS

Authorities.—Germāl-ed-dīn al-Hāfi, Alī Sīhār, Ḥāfi-al-Āthīr, Ibrāhīm b. Ibrāhīm, Ibrāhīm b. Kallakshayūb, al-Nāṣir, Wüstenfeld, Gerch, d. Journal des Chal., Quatremère, J. M. de Gobineau, Ét. Egypt. n.

Mosques.—Mosques, el-Azhar (970-2), I. Ayyūb (969-1003), and Ghayrābī (1084), second wall of Cairo (1063), and three gates of Nasr, Fustāt (1087), and Zawīla (1091). Mosques el-Akmār (1125), e-Takāhānī (1148, but restored), eg Siliq (1160).

Inscriptions.—Fātimid's inscr. in Arbat, 1½ km (disappeared, but recorded by Hammer, Journ. As., III., v. 388), on Giben-Nasr, second wall of Cairo, chapel of Sitt Nafis, Nilometer, mosque of Ibrāhīm (restoration inscr.), rock at Rahwa, near Damascus. (Van Berchem, Notes, Journ. As., 1891, and Corpus Inscr. Arab.; Kay, J. R. A. S., N.S., xxii.)

Coinage.—Mints, in Egypt: Misr (Fustāt), el-Kāhara (Cairo, 1003-4, 1114 ff.), Alexandria, Kūs (1123-4); in Africa (Tunisia), al-Mansūriya, al-Mahdiya (to 1064); Zawīla; Sicily (to 1054); Necca (976-7), Medina (1061) in Syria, Himsin (Ranīla), Damascus (to 1067), 'Aynā, Ascalon, Tibarīs, Tripoli, Tyre, Aleppo (1050-5).

Glass Weights. These bear the names of all the caliphs, and sometimes dates, and are very numerous (Lane Poole Cat. Ar. Wts., Campana, Cat. Fouquet).

THE Fātimid rule established in Egypt by Mo'izz subsisted <sup>933</sup> for two centuries by no merits of the rulers nor any devotion of their subjects. Most of the caliphs were absorbed in their own pleasures, and the government devolved on wezirs, who were frequently changed in accordance with their sovereigns' or the army's constant demand for more money and the ministers' success or failure in satisfying it. Most of the wezirs were bent mainly on money-getting. No great ideas, no ambitious schemes found a place in their policy. The empire, which in the days of Mo'izz included the whole of north Africa, Sicily, Syria, and the Hijāz soon sank to little more than Egypt proper. The African provinces, from mere tributary connexion, passed in 1046 to frank independence, and reverted to their old allegiance (however nominal) to the caliphs of Baghdad. Syria was always loosely held, and was the scene of frequent rebellions and civil wars.<sup>1</sup> In Arabia alone the Fatimids acquired an increased influence, not by any effort of their own, but by the Shi'a propaganda which went on independently of their leading. In Egypt itself their power rested upon no equitable basis, nor upon any general adhesion to the Shi'a doctrines or their disputed pedigree, which was repeatedly refuted by Shi'a and Sunni theologians; their throne was founded upon fear and subsisted by the terror of their foreign legions. The Berber troops, constantly recruited from their birthplace in the west, the Turkish mercenaries renewed by purchase or volunteering from the east, the bloody and sensual Sūdāns from the south, these were the bulwarks of the Egyptian caliphate and the sole cause of its longevity. Yet even in face of such a military tyranny, it may be questioned whether any people but the patient Egyptians would have submitted so long to an intolerable yoke.

The beginning, it is true, of this long oppression gave no promise of its coming burden. El-Aziz,<sup>2</sup> the son of Mo'izz (975—990), who succeeded his father in December, 975, but was not formally proclaimed till the Feast <sup>74</sup> of Sacrifice in August, 976, was an excellent ruler. Big, brave, and comely in person—though with reddish hair and blue eyes, always scared by Arabs—a bold hunter and a fearless general, he was of a humane and conciliatory disposition, loth to take offence, and averse from bloodshed. The tendency of the Fatimid creed (or policy) was towards toleration or indifference in regard to religion and race; but in the case of 'Aziz a special influence was exerted by a Christian wife, the mother, strange to say, of the monster Hükmi. Her two brothers were appointed Melkite patriarchs of Alexandria and Jerusalem, by the caliph's express though irregular command, and the Christians never enjoyed so much toleration as under his rule. The Coptic patriarch Ephraim stood in high favour at his court, and obtained leave to rebuild the ruined church of Abū-s-Seytēn (St. Mercurius) outside Fustāt, and the opposition of the Muslims, who had turned it into a sugar warehouse, was summarily suppressed by the caliph.<sup>1</sup> With the catholicity or speculative curiosity characteristic of the Fatimids, 'Aziz encouraged Severus, the bishop of Uslimuneyn, to discuss points of doctrine with the Muslim divines, such as the famous ḫadī Ibn-en-No'mān, president of the prayers and director of the mint and of weights and measures for fourteen years, and the caliph even refused to persecute a Muslim who turned Christian, though apostasy was punishable by death. His generosity extended to his enemies, he knew how to respect a brave man, and when the gallant Turk sh leader Astegin, who had raised all Syria against him and even out-generalled the veteran Gawhar, was betrayed into his hands, the caliph gave him a high post at court and loaded him with rewards for his valour in the field.

<sup>1</sup> The vicissitudes of the Fatimid rule in Syria are reserved for the next chapter.

<sup>2</sup> There were at least three formal repudiations of their pretended descent from the Prophet, drawn up at Baghdad, signed by celebrated doctors of the law of all schools, and circulated in Syria, and even communicated to the Fatimid caliphs themselves.

<sup>1</sup> Full name and title: al-Imām Nāṣir Abū Ma'āṣir el-'Azīz bi'llah ("the mighty through God") emīr-al-mu'mīnīn (commander of the faithful). His coins were issued at Al-ai (Fustat) A.H. 305 (920)—336 (946); Palestine (Ramla) 364—383; al-Mashayka, 370—384, and el-Mansuriya, in Africa, 367—386; Sicily, 366—377; Tripoli, in Syria, 374, and Nekka, 376. The silver coinage is continuous every year, but the coinage at the other mints seems to have been issued at irregular intervals when required. The same remark applies to later Fatimid mints. The coinage that has come down to us is almost entirely of gold, but the silver currency, though nearly destroyed, must have been very large.

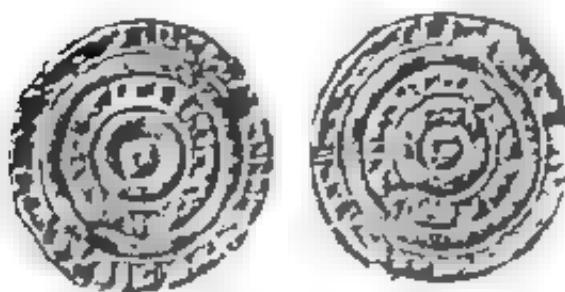

Fig. 23.—Dirhams of al-Aziz, Misr, 976.

<sup>1</sup> Abu Shik, II. 344—36.

For the first fifteen years of his reign the caliph's chief minister or wazir was the converted Jew, Ibn-Killis, who had served Mo'izz well and became the right hand of his son. It was largely due to this man's prudent statesmanship that Egypt enjoyed a long period of perfect tranquillity, and that the treasury overflowed with wealth. Another high official, who also became wazir for the last two years of the reign, was the Christian 'Isa b. Nestorius; and a Jew, Marasseh, was at one time chief secretary in Syria. These appointments naturally gave offence to the Muslims, who found themselves in the odd situation of being worse off under a Mohammedan sovereign than were the "infidels." Poets wrote sarcastic verses, and remonstrances were thrust into the caliph's hands as he rode through the streets. He attempted to pacify his too zealous subjects by removing the obnoxious officials from their posts; but in the case of Ibn-Nestorius, at least, harim influence was too strong, and the caliph's beloved and capable daughter, the Princess Roxel (Sevidet-el-mulk), obtained the Christian's restoration. In truth, 'Aziz could not do without the help of these able servants, who were evidently superior to their Muslim colleagues in business capacity. When Ibn-Killis was thrown into prison for poisoning, out of mere jealousy, the Turkish favourite Astegin, his master miscalculated his counsels so much that in forty days he was restored to office. A similar degradation of the same wazir in the following year (983) was followed by an almost equally speedy restoration. Firm and just administration, backed by a powerful army, no doubt reconciled the Muslim population in some degree to what they regarded as an unnatural preference; but their dissatisfaction was always ready to break into active hostility on provocation. During the war with the emperor Basil in 996, for which 'Aziz had built a fine fleet of 600 sail, eleven of his largest vessels lying in the harbour of Mala on the Nile (then the port of Cairo), were set on fire, and the sailors and mob, ascribing the disaster to the Greek inhabitants of the neighbourhood, massacred many of them, plundered their goods, and played ball with their heads. Order was promptly restored, however, and in three months the energy of Ibn Nestorius produced six new vessels of the first class.<sup>1</sup>

Able as these ministers were, they shamed with their master an inordinate love of wealth and luxury. Ibn-Killis, who died in 931, enjoyed a salary of 100,000 D.,<sup>2</sup> and left a princely fortune in lands, houses, shops, slaves, horses, furniture, robes, and jewels, value at four million dinars, besides his daughter's dowry of 200,000 D. He kept 500 harem women, besides servants, and his body-guard consisted of 4000 young men white and black. His house, the "Palace of the Wezir," was fortified and isolated like a castle. His choice carrier pigeons outstripped the caliph's own. Aziz himself attended his funeral (which was as sumptuous as his daily life), and supplied the embalming materials, camphor and musk, and rosewater, and fifty gorgeous robes for the shrouding of the corpse. Mounted on a mule, and rejecting the usual parasol of state, the caliph rode slowly to the house of his faithful counsellor, and standing before the bier, weeping, said the prayers for the dead, and with his own hand set the stone to the entrance of the tomb. For three days he kept no table and received no guests. Eighteen days the offices of government remained closed, and no business was done. For a month the grave was a place of pilgrimage, where poets recited the virtues of the departed, at the caliph's expense, and a legion of Koran-readers chanted the sacred book day and night. Slave girls stood beside with silver cups and spoons to minister creature comforts of wine and sweetmeats to the crowd of mourning or interested visitors. The caliph freed all the mamiks of the deceased vezir, paid his outstanding debts, and arranged for the salaries and maintenance of his vast household. In contrast to this display, when a year later the great general G'awhar died, in the comparative obscurity of his later years, one reads only of a present of 3000 D. from the caliph to his family in token of regard.

<sup>1</sup> Nasir-i-Khusru, who in 1046 saw seven of the galleys of Meliz drawn up on the bank of the Nile, where they had been beached on the eve of the three-quarters of a century before, says that they measured 150 cubits long by 60 in the beam (Safar Nâma, ed. Schäfer, 156). This would probably represent about 275 ft. by 110 ft.

'Aziz himself set the example of luxury which makes the records of Fatimid wealth almost incredible to those who do not realise the oriental passion for gewgaws. The caliph was a connoisseur in precious stones and articles of taste'<sup>1</sup>. A number of sumptuous novelties are ascribed by the historian Genîl-ed-din of Aleppo<sup>2</sup> to this reign, such as the heavy gold-embroidered many-colored turbans sixty yards long, made of the costly fabrics woven at the royal factories of Debik; robes and coverings of the 'Atâbi (aby) cloth of Bighidja, or the coloured stuffs of Ramla and Tiberias, or Cairo sâlikün, horse housings set with jewels and scented with ambergris, to cover armour inlaid with gold. The luxury of the person was matched by the luxury of the table. Fish were brought fresh from the sea to Cairo, a thing unknown before, truffles were eagerly sought a few miles from Nukattam and sold in the markets in such quantities that from choice dainties they became cheap and common. The love of rarities brought strange animals and birds to Cairo, female elephants, which the Nubians had carefully reserved were at length introduced for breeding, and a stuffed rhinoceros delighted the astonished crowd. These novelties were secured at a cost which made heavy demands on the treasury, and could be met only by rigorous financial control. 'Aziz kept a tight hand over his exchequer, and strictly forbade all bribes and presents, nothing could be paid without a written order. The money was not all spent upon luxuries, however. His reign saw many architectural and engineering triumphs at Cairo, such as the Golden Palace, the Pearl Pavilion, his mother's mosque in the Kerâfa cemetery, the foundation in 991 of the great mosque known as el-Hâkim's (then outside the Bab-en-Nâr), some important canals, bridges, and naval docks. 'Aziz was a man of orderly mind, and introduced many reforms in ceremonies and management. He was the first to make processions in state every Friday in Ramadân, the month of fasting, and to perform the prescribed service in the presence of the people as their high-priest, the first to give fixed salaries to his servants and retainers, and to supervise their liveries; the first of his family to adopt the disastrous policy of importing and favouring Turkish troops. With all his shrewdness and no unconsiderable culture, and a turn for poetry, he fancied himself a sooth-sayer—indeed, it was part of the Fâtimid pretension to know the unknown—and exposed himself to some ridicule on this score. He once went out of his way to satirize the Omayyad caliph of Cordova in an insulting letter, but received the crushing retort. "You ridicule us because you have heard of us: if we had ever heard of you, we should reply." Nevertheless 'Aziz was the wisest and most beneficent of all the Fâtimid caliphs of Egypt. The unbroken rest which the country enjoyed is his best witness; and though Africa was loosening its ties to Egypt, and Syria was only held down by force of arms, the name of 'Aziz was prayed for in the mosques from the Atlantic to the Red Sea, in the Yemen, in the sanctuary of Mekka,<sup>1</sup> and once (992) even in the pulpit of Mosul. A complication of agonizing disorders carried off this great ruler at Bilârs, October 996, after a touching interview<sup>2</sup> with his little son, in 994 happy ignorance, despite his prophetic fancy, of the evil which the boy would work in the kingdom his father had so carefully nursed.

<sup>1</sup> A crystal vase in the treasure of St. Mark at Venice is said to bear the name of el-'Aziz; cp. the St. Denis vase in the Louvre, and see Lane Poole, Art of the Saracens, 163, Madrid, L. 409 E., etc.

<sup>2</sup> Extract in Württemberg, 162-4.

El-Hâkim,<sup>3</sup> (996—1021), the only son of this prudent

<sup>1</sup> A coin of A.H. 366 (976-7) struck at Mekka bears the name of 'Aziz (B.M. Cat., iv., p. ix.).

<sup>2</sup> See Iba-Khalîkân, iii. 529.

<sup>3</sup> El-Sâlih Abû-'Ali el-Hâkim bi-amri-lâh ("ruling by God's

father and Christian mother, was but eleven years old when 'Aziz fell dead in his bath at Bilbeys. The emir Bargawān fetched him out of a big tree, and hastily setting the jewelled turban on his head, brought him forth to the people, who kissed the ground before their new Imām. Next day, lance in hand, and sword hanging from the shoulder, the little boy followed the camels that bore his father's remains back to Cairo; and the day after he was solemnly enthroned in the great palace in the presence of the whole Court, marshalled in order of rank. For the first few years he was naturally kept in a state of tutelage. His governor (ustad), appointed by 'Aziz, was the Slave eunuch Bargawān, whose name is still commemorated in one of the streets of Cairo; the Maghribi (Berber) Ibn-'Amīr was given the command of the troops, with the title of "intermediary" (el-Wāṣi) and the surname Amin ed dawla ("warden of the realm"); whilst the Christian Ibn-Nestorius continued to control the finances until his summary execution. The Berber general was practically regent, and used his power to promote the interests of his own tribe, the Kāma, and to subordinate the Turk shā party (command"). His coins were struck at Mys, el-Mansūriya, el-Maṣrīya, Zawīa (once), Sicily, Damascus, Tarsus (Harrān), Tyre (once), Tripoli (once), and once at Cairo with the epithet "guaranteed" (el-Katib al-Māritiṣa). The glass weights (for testing dinars and dirhams, and their fractions and multiples) bearing el-Hakim's name, and sometimes a date, are numerous.

Fig. 24.—1-Dinars of el-Hakim,
Sicily, 1004.

<sup>1</sup> He was the first Maghribi to receive an honorific nickname in Egypt. The practice of inventing special designations and titles for weirs, popular with this pompous dynasty, dates from this time. Examples are the title of "Generalissimo" (Kāid al-Kuwākī) given to Bargawān's successor el-Hoseyn, the son of Gāwāb, Salib of Ruthibār was called Tiklīf iḥkām wa-walāyah, "trick of the trustee of the pen and the sword"; Ibn 'Abdūn, al-Kāfi, "the efficient"; Zura' the son of Ibn Nestorius, ab-Shafī, "the secretary"; o. Hoseyn b. Tāħr, Amin al-Umāl, "faithful of the faithful"; 'All b. Gāfar el-Fidāħi, Dhikr Ruybatayn, "he of the two departments" etc. From 1117, the weirs of the Fatimids took the title of mashī, "king".

imported by 'Aziz. The Berbers accordingly waxed insolent, plundered and ill-treated the Egyptians, and fought the Turkish soldiery in the streets. It became a struggle between east and west, and the east won. The Kitânia were beaten and disgraced. Ibn-'Anîmâr was deprived of his office; the Turks sacked his palace, and when he ventured to come to court, they cut him down and presented his head to the delighted young caliph.

Bargawân, who had hitherto lived quietly in the palace, protecting his ward, now became regent, and intoxicated by sudden power and riches abandoned himself entirly to pleasure. He passed his time agreeably in the society of singers, listening to the music he loved, in the Pearl Palace which 'Aziz had built near the bridge-gate, overlooking the beautiful gardens of Kâfûr on the one hand, and on the other commanding a view over the canal to the Nile and the pyramids. Immersed in pleasure he lost all count of power. Hâkim, left without control, began to assert himself and despise his governor, who, tutor-like, had called his pupil names. Very soon the boy began his career of bloodshed by having Bargawân assassinated. The people, shocked at ... the death of the popular chief, crowded threateningly to the palace; but the caliph put them off with lies and appealed to them to support him in his helpless youthfulness. The mob dispersed, and a dangerous crisis was over. It was a lesson in deportment that Hâkim did not forget.

As the young caliph came more before the public, the eccentricities of his character began to appear. His strange face, with its terrible blue eyes, made people shrink; his big voice made them tremble. His tutor had called him "a lizard," and he had a creepy slippery way of gliding among his subjects that explained the nickname. He had a passion for darkness, would summon his council to meet at night, and would ride about the streets on his grey ass night after night, spying into the ways and opinions of the people under pretence of inspecting the market weights and measures. Night was turned into day by his command. All business and catering was ordered to take place after sunset. The shops had to be opened and the houses illuminated to serve his whim, and when the poor people overdid the thing and began to frolic in the unwonted hours, repressive orders were issued; women forbidden to leave their homes, and men to sit in the booths. Shoemakers were ordered to make no outdoor boots for women, so that they might not have the wherewithal to stir abroad, and the ladies of Cairo were not only enjoined on no account to allow themselves to be seen at the lattice windows, but might not even take the air on the flat roofs of their houses. Stringent regulations were issued about food and drink. Hakim was a zealous abstainer, as all Muslims are expected to be. Beer was forbidden, wine was confiscated, vines cut down, even dried raisins were contraband; in drinking (Jews' in Haw) was not to be eaten, and honey was seized and poured into the Nile. Games, such as the Egyptian chess, were prohibited, and the chessboards burnt. Dogs were to be killed wherever found in the streets, but the finest cattle could not be slaughtered save at the Feast of Sacrifice. Those who ventured to disobey these decrees were scourged and beheaded, or put to death by some of the novel forms of torture which the ingenuous caliph delighted in inventing. A good many of these novel regulations were no doubt inspired by a genuine reforming spirit, but it was the spirit of a mad reformer. The lively ladies of Cairo have always needed a tight hand over them, but who could expect to restrain a woman by confiscating her boots? The prohibition of intoxicating liquors, gambling, and public amusements, was in keeping with the character of a sour and bitter Puritan, and were doubtless intended as much to improve the morals as to vex the souls of his subjects. But the nightly wanderings, the needless restrictions and harassing regulations concerning immaterial details, were signs of an unbalanced mind. Hakim may have meant well according to his lights, but his lights were strangely prismatic.

During the first ten years of the reign the Christians and Jews enjoyed the immunity and even privileges which they had obtained under the tolerant rule of 'Aziz; but as time went on they came in for their share of irrational persecution.<sup>1</sup> In public they were forced to wear black robes by way of livery, and in the baths, where one man without clothes is very like another, the naked Christians were compelled to distinguish themselves by wearing large and heavy crosses, while the Jews had to wear bells, or in the streets display a wooden image of a calf, in pleasing allusion to a discreditable episode in their early history. Next, a general order was issued for the destruction of all the Christian churches in Egypt, and the confiscation of their lands and property: the work of demolition went on for at least five years (1007—12). The Christians were offered the choice of becoming Muslims, or leaving the country or else wearing a heavy cross as a badge of their degradation. Many Christians, especially among the peasantry, to escape persecution, accepted the Mohammedan religion; and the office where the declarations of conversion were received on two days in the week was besieged with applications, insomuch that some of these eager proselytes were trampled to death in the crush. Such as remained true to their faith were subjected to various humiliations, and forbidden to ride horses, to keep Muslim servants, to be rowed by Muslim boatmen, or to purchase slaves.<sup>2</sup>

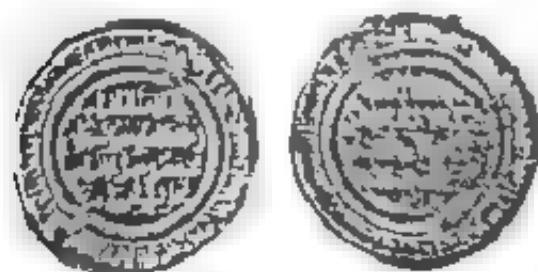

FIG. 25.—Dinar of el Hakim, M. 971, 1015.

<sup>1</sup> The caliph was said to have been excited against the Christians by a monk in revenge for the patriarch's refusal of a bishopric. See Renaudot, Hist. Patri., 388.

<sup>2</sup> Some of these restrictions were scarcely oppressive. The Christians seem to have voluntarily adopted the black dress two centuries before (Abū-Sālib, §22), and riding horses had become the mark of the soldier. Hākim himself rode an ass. The purchase of slaves by Christians can only mean the purchase of Christian slaves.

The penalties inflicted upon Christians, however, were more a part of a general contempt of mankind than a sign of special dislike to one section. Whilst these very orders were being issued, Christians were still appointed to the highest offices, in virtue, no doubt, of their superior fiscal capacity. Iba-'Abdūn, the vezir who had to sign the decree for the demolition of the Church of the Resurrection at Jerusalem, was a Christian; and his successor was another Christian, "the Trusty" Zura, the son of the aged ex-vezir Ibn-Nestorius, who died in 1012. It is true their "path of glory led but to the grave." Ilakim's vezirs, whether Christian or Muslim, were murdered with scrupulous impartiality. Fahd, a Muslim prime-minister, was made away with in 1003, and his successor was executed a month later; Ibi-'Abdūn was killed in 1010, and in the same year the geterissimo Hoseyn, the son of G'awār, after being degraded and obliged to fly then restored to office and apparent favour, was foully murdered in the palace by his treacherous sovereign, after every assurance of protection. Officials were tortured and killed like flies; arms were hacked off, tongues cut out, every kind of barbarity inflicted. A special department of government, the dīwān mafrid, was established for the management of the confiscated property of murdered and disgraced officials.

The deadly freaks of the caliph were most acutely felt at Cairo, but his fantastic orders ran throughout his dominions and all Egypt suffered. Three years of low Niles increased the distress, and were taken as God's judgment for the wickedness of the times. It was no wonder that an adventurer was able to raise the country and defy the Fatimid armies for two years. A member of the royal Omavyad family, flying from Spain, set himself up as caliph, and winning the adhesion of the Beni-Kurra Arabs and of the Kizluna Berbers, who had never forgiven their humiliation at the hands of the Turks in Cairo, obtained possession of Barka, defeated the Fatimid troops sent against him, and over-ran Egypt. Abu-Rakwa,<sup>1</sup> "the father of the leather bottle," as he was called, from the waterskin he carried after the manner of the dervishes, worsted the caliph's army again at Giza, and camping beside the pyramids kept Cairo in a fever of alarm. When at last he was crushed in a bloody battle, and captured in Nubia, his head and 30,000 skulls of his followers were sent in procession through all the towns of Syria on the backs of a hundred camels, and then thrown into the Euphrates. The general Faḍl, who had rid the caliph of this rascal, reaped an ill reward for his service. He had the misfortune to enter the royal presence when Ḥakim was busily engaged in cutting up the body of a beautiful little child whom he had just murdered with his own knife. El-Faḍl could not restrain his horror, but he knew the consequences: he went straight home, made his will, and admitted the caliph's headsman an hour later. He had seen too much.

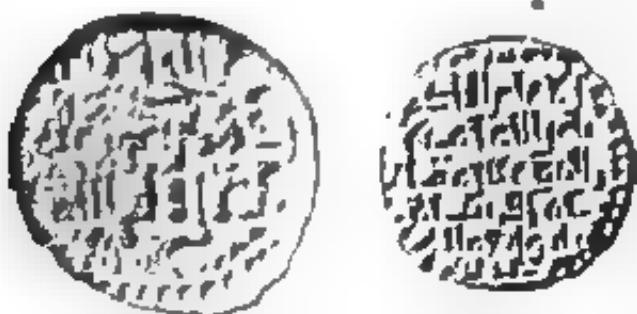

Fig. 26.—Glass weight of al-Hakim, 1017

With all his frantic savagery, Ḥakim had gleams of intelligence and certainly of piety; and his reign was not altogether wanting in religious and public works. His most famous monument is the mosque that still bears his name, close to the north gate of Bib-en-Naṣr. Begun by his father in 991, it was completed in 1003, except the heightening of the minaret. He also built the Rāshida mosque, and often prayed there on Fridays; and at Maḳṣ he founded both a mosque for the next world and a belvedere for this, near the river bank.

<sup>1</sup> His adopted titles were eth-Thāfir bi-ummāt-lāh and el-Muntashir min-aṭdū-lāh, both favourites with Shi'a pretenders, but strange in an Ommayad.

His most original foundation, however, was the "Hall of Science" (Dâr-el-'Ilm, or Dâr-el-Hikma), erected in 1005 chiefly for the propagation of Shi'a theology and every sort of heterodoxy, but also for the promotion of learning in general—astronomy, lexicology, grammar, poetry, criticism, law, and medicine. It was a luxuriously fitted establishment, with a magnificent library, largely supplied from the royal palaces, open to every one, and supplied with all necessaries of study.<sup>1</sup> All the men of learning of Cairo and many visitors from afar used to meet there, and once they were invited in a body to the palace, and to their surprise returned clothed with robes of honour instead of losing their heads.

Fig. 27.—Mosque of el-Hâkîm, 991-1003.

Even in his buildings, however there was something fantastic and suspicious. When he set up a great barn on the Mukattam hills, and filled it with firewood, the people were convinced that he meditated a general holocaust on a gigantic scale, and an official proclamation barely reassured them. The desert slopes of Mukattam were his favourite haunt. There he had his observatory (another in the Kerâfa was never finished), where he pursued the astrological calculations which he sternly forbade to his subjects. Hither he would ride on his grey ass before break of day, dressed in the extreme simplicity which he substituted for the pomp and splendour of his ancestors, attired in a plain robe of one colour, without a jewel even in his turban, and attended by a groom or two, or often quite alone. It must be admitted that he had courage. When he had roused hatred on all sides, killed whole families on suspicion, and exasperated every passion of vengeance, he still rode out, scarcely attended, in the deserts or in the crowded streets, by day and by night, indulging in fresh fancies or prying into the ways of his subjects too often with bloody consequences. Only his deadly ferocity, and a sense of mysterious awe, saved him from the hourly risks of assassination. Not an attempt was made upon him for a quarter of a century. It is true he had an omnipresent secret police, including women spies, who served him well in the harem.

<sup>1</sup> The sums allowed for the maintenance of the Hall of Science seem small compared with the luxury of the times. The annual grant for paper for copying MSS. was 90 D.; for ink and pens, etc., 12 D., for repairing books, 12 D., for cushions and carpets and winter curtains, 19 D.; for water, 12 D.; for salaries of the librarian and servants, 63 D. The total grant was 275 D. (Mahriet, Khitâr, 1. 409). The Hall of Science was closed in 1119 by the wazîr Algal, in consequence of its use by heretical teachers, but a new Hall of Science was built near the great palace, and opened in 1133 by order of his successor, the wazîr Ma'mûn.

Matters grew worse as the caliph grew older. Wanton executions and confiscations became more frequent, and other people's lands were bestowed at random on common soldiers and sailors, or anybody. The folk began to fly the country. The bazaars of Fustat were closed. All business was at a standstill. For seven years not a woman was seen in the streets. Revolt was in the air.

<sup>103</sup> Alexandria was independent under the Kurra Arabs. At Cairo a female gy was set up in the street, lampoon in hand. The caliph took it as he rode by, and black <sup>104</sup> with fury seized the supposed woman, who proved to be of paper. Thereupon, in one of his ungovernable passions of rage, Hākim sent his black troops to burn Fustat. The inhabitants ran to arms; there was three days' fighting in the streets, the mosque was full of shrieking supplicants, half the city was sacked or burnt, and many of its women enslaved. Still the people endured. Then a new mania seized the bemused caliph. He fancied himself the Incarnation of the Godhead, and compelled all men to worship his name. It was the legitimate outcome of extreme Shi'a mysticism, and it found support. One Hasan, known as "Slit-nose" (el-Akhram), came from distant Farghana and preached the divinity of Hākim. A man of the people murdered him and was executed, and the Sunnis honoured the murderer's grave. Then Hamza came from Sasan, in <sup>105</sup> Persia, to propagate the new doctrine, and won many adherents, who adorned themselves with strange titles. Some of these fanatics rode into the old mosque of 'Amr at Fustat and began to preach, their followers applauding and clapping their hands like thunder. The people flocked in to see the sight, but when one of the preachers addressed the kādi "In the Name of el Hākim the Compassionate the Merciful," it was too much: a tumult ensued, the people killed the blasphemers, dragged their bodies through the streets, and burnt them.

Never had Hākim been so near a revolution. His palace was besieged by the Turkish troops in search of Dardzi, a leader of the new-fangled sect, who had taken refuge there : but Hākim was true to his insolent courage. He told them from a balcony that the man was not there, and afterwards that he was dead ; he lied, but he did not give him up. Dardzi escaped to found the Druze religion in the Lebanon. For a time Hākim dissembled his rage, but in the seclusion of his palace he was concocting plans of vengeance. After a month or so of ominous reserve, the negro troops were again sent into Fusṭāt, where the revolt had begun. They went quietly, in separate bands ; but once there, they set about plundering and devastating the city, burst into houses and even baths, hauling out the young girls, and committing every atrocity that black blood suggests. The caliph came riding along on his ass, as usual, and to him the desperate folk crowded with piteous entreaty to be saved from the brutal soldiery. He answered never a word.

One result of his assumption of Godhead was the relaxation of many of the prescribed rules of Isīmī. In his new capacity Hākim rescinded the laws of fasting and pilgrimage, since the ordinances of the Korān were to be interpreted allegorically, and he personally abandoned the now superfluous habits of prayer and fasting. It was probably in the same spirit of religious emancipation, as much as to add to the exasperation of his afflicted Muslim subjects, that he rescinded his penalties against Christians, permitted them to resume their religion, and rebuild their churches. Many nominal Muslims thus reverted openly to their real creed, and the churches were restored to more than their former state. On the other hand the Muslims were treated with increased barbarity ; nothing was safe from the black troops, and the people prayed in the mosques and cried aloud in vain, for there was none to help them.

At last a stand was made. The Turkish troops and the Kitūma Berbers, finding themselves neglected, made common cause against the black infantry, and in a series of street battles broke their power and restored some degree of order in the distracted city. Hākim for once could make no head against the resistance of the indignant troops. He had raised up, moreover, a powerful enemy within his own household. His only sister, the Princess Royal, a woman of spotless character and great intelligence, had not escaped the madman's rancour. She rebuked him boldly for the horrors of his reign ; he retorted by an outrageous slander against her chastity. To save her father's kingdom for her father's grandchild, no less than to preserve her purity from an odious ordeal, she abandoned her wretched brother, and joined the rising conspiracy. She entered into negotiations with the Berber chiefs, and the result was soon seen.

On February 13th, 1011, Hakim took his wonted ride towards the Mukattam hills, and rambled about all night. In the morning he dismissed his two grooms, and went on alone into the desert, as he had often done before. Some days later his ass was found, maimed, on the hills, then his coat of seven colours, with dagger marks ; his body was never discovered. After four years a man confessed to the murder, "out of zeal for God and Islam" but a mystery still hung over the vanishing of the mad caliph. People refused to believe that he was really dead. His return was anxiously awaited. Pretenders arose and claimed to be the lost Hakim ; and to this day the Druzes in the Lebanon worship the Divine Reason incarnate in his singularly unworthy person, and believe that one day he will come again in majesty and reveal truth and judgment.

The effects of this terrible quarter of a century could not be speedily undone, nor was Hakim's only son, a boy of sixteen, who was proclaimed caliph with the name of az-Zahir<sup>1</sup> (1021-1036), the man for the crisis. His aunt, the Princess Royal (Seyyidet-el-Mulk), managed the affairs of state for four years, but she had to deal with a military oligarchy, and to meet them with their own unl handsome weapons. The Berber leader of the revolt against Hākim was treacherously murdered in the palace by her order, and the execution of two vezirs followed. After her death the government fell into the hands of a court clique, who, to preserve their power, banished wiser counsellors from the young caliph's side, and encouraged him in his natural folly and self-indulgence. Once a day the three sheyiks who formed this cabal visited the royal youth in due form, but all serious affairs of government were arranged without his concurrence. The condition of the people, relieved by the cancelling of all Hākim's obnoxious restrictions, was nevertheless aggravated by a serious failure of the inundation, which entailed great scarcity and high prices. Oxen rose to 50 D a head, and their slaughter had to be prohibited, to prevent utter extermination. Camels of burden became scarce, and fowls, the common meat of Egypt, were not to be had. People tried to sell their furniture, and could not find purchasers. They sickened and died for want of food, and the stronger turned brigand and plundered the caravans, even of pilgrims; the roads were infested with robbers, and the Syrian rebels invaded the frontier towns. The people crowded before the palace, crying, "Hunger, hunger! O commander of the faithful, it was not thus under your father and grandfather!" The palace itself was so short of food, that when the banquet for the Feast of Sacrifice was spread, the starving slaves swept the table. The of Mier, el-Mangriya, el Mahdiya, Zawila (once), Sicily, Palestine (Ramlia), and Tyre and Alexandria appears for the first time as a Fātimid mint in A.H. 423 (1032). Numerous glass weights, often dated, exist.

<sup>1</sup> Hakim in 1013 had set aside his only son, the future Zahir, and proclaimed as his successor a certain 'Abd-er-Rahmān, a great-grandson of al-Mahdi. This person was duly recognised in Amrūtah and Siddiqah, prayer and coins, and coins bearing his name, struck at Miṣr, Damascus, and el-Manṣūriyah, are found, from 1012 to 1021, with the title "Bair of the covenant of the Muslims." When Zahir succeeded his father, 'Abd-er-Rahmān absconded.

<sup>2</sup> Abu-l-Husayn 'Ali az-Zahir b. 'Umar-din-līlāh, "the triumphant in strengthening God's religion." His coins were issued from the mints

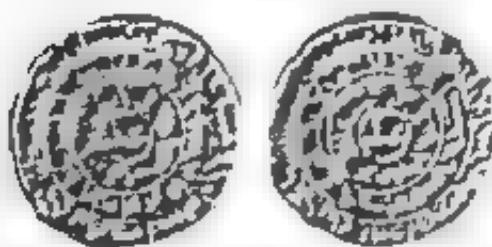

Fig. 23.—Dinars of al-Zahir, Mier, 1030.

treasury was empty, the taxes in arrears. Slaves broke into revolt, and the citizens formed committees of safety, and were permitted to kill them in self-defence. Barricades were thrown up to keep the rebels out. The wazir, el-Gargardj, was a prisoner in his own house. The situation was critical ; but an ample Nile in 1027 restored plenty, and with the relief from famine the disturbances quieted down.

Besides the Syrian war (see ch. vi.), the most notable event of Zahir's fifteen years' reign was a solitary religious persecution in 1025, when all the divines of the Maliki school were banished from Egypt. As a rule there was perfect toleration of the Mohammadan sects, and the Sunnis were not disturbed in the free exercise of their religious rites. A treaty was also made with the Roman Emperor, Constantine VIII, who allowed Zahir's name to be prayed for in the mosques in his dominions, and <sup>1025</sup> the mosque at Constantinople to be restored, in return for the caliph's permission to rebuild the Church of the Resurrection at Jerusalem.<sup>1</sup> Zahir himself was completely engrossed in his pleasures and in the training of his mamlik guard ; but his love of music and dancers was combined with a savage cruelty which proved him his father's son. He once invited all the young girls of the palace to a merry-making. They came in their holiday best, and were led into the mosque, to await the festivities. The doors were then closed and bricked up, and 2600 girls perished of starvation. The history adds that for six months their bodies lay there unburied, and it is a relief to learn that the wretch who planned this wanton barbarity himself died of the plague in June, 1036.

He was followed by his seven year old son Ma'add (1036—1094), who, at the age of eight months, had been proclaimed heir, and now assumed the caliphate with the name of el-Mustansir.<sup>2</sup> His reign of sixty lunar

<sup>1</sup> Malik i. 355. This arrangement was renewed in 1037-8, when the emperor Michael IV released 5000 Muslim prisoners and sent architects to Jerusalem. Abū-l-Fidā, ii. 96.

<sup>2</sup> Abu Tawdīn Ma'add al-Mustansir bi'llah, "The seeker of aid from God." With the exception of five years (four of which, 1070 ff., years and four months is probably the longest recorded of any Mohammadan ruler. For the third time in the history of the Fatimids we find a woman's influence almost supreme. The Christian wife of 'Aziz, the political sister of Hakim, were followed by the black mother of Ma'add. She was a Sudāni slave, bought of a Jew of Tustar, and she and Abū-Sa'īd, her Hebrew vendor, enjoyed most of the power during the caliph's childhood. By their exertions the new vizir who succeeded Gārgārāt (1044) was deposed and executed, and Ṣadāka, a renegade Jew, appointed in his place. The renegade, however, finding Abū-Sa'īd's interference intolerable, turned upon his patron and had him murdered by the Turkish guard. In revenge, the wāliya (dowager, or caliph's mother) had the vizir assassinated. The next minister sought to balance the overweening power of the Turks by importing negro troops but he too was deposed, and his successor held office for only three months. Then, in 1050, el-Yāzī entered upon a vizirate which lasted eight years.

<sup>1044</sup>

In territorial extent the dominions of the Fatimids were now reduced to little more than Egypt itself. Syria had long resisted their authority (see ch. v.). North Africa, under four successive rulers of the Sanhāja Berbers, seated at Mahdiya, had acknowledged their suzerainty by citing the caliphs' names in the prayer and on the coinage, by paying an annual tribute, and by receiving formal investiture on each succession by the caliph's diploma; but about 1044 Mo'izz, the ruling governor, joined the orthodox Sunnī sect, and renouncing fall during or immediately after the great famine) there is a consecutive series of annual mints of Mustansīr's gold coins from the mint of Miṣr from A.H. 427 to 486 (1036-93). His other mints were Alexandria (especially during the last twenty years of the reign, to A.H. 458 = 1055), el-Basta, el-Mansūriya (to 1036-7), el-Mahdiya (to 1065), Sicily (to 1054-5), Filestīn (Ramla), Damascus, Tiberias (Tiberias) 'Akka, Tyre, Tripoli, Aleppo (1050-5), Medina (1061), and Baghdad (Madinat-es-Selīm, 1058). His glass weights abound.

Fig. 29.—Glass weight of el-Mustansīr

the Fātimids accepted a fresh investiture from the 'Abbāsid caliph in 1046.<sup>1</sup> At this the Shi'a of the west revolted against Mu'izz, and at the same time on the east the Egyptian government sent the great Arab tribe of Hilāl to bring him back to his allegiance. The Hilāl occupied Barkā and Tripolis, and settled there; but Mu'izz, though defeated, maintained his in dependence at Mahdiya, letting other minor states spring up further west. Sicily, where the Kūbi emirs had recognized the Fātimid supremacy, fell to the Normans in 1071 ff.<sup>2</sup> Henceforth, beyond an intermittent authority in Barkā, the rulers of Egypt owned no subjects further west.

Fig. 30.—Dinar of el-Mu'tanāṣir, Misr, 1047.

In Arabia on the other hand, they received an unexpected accession of prestige by the voluntary homage of a Shi'a proselyte, 'Ali the Suleyhid, who subdued the Yemen and the Hīgazz from Ḥagramawt to Mekka by 1063, and proclaimed the divine right of the Fātimid caliph in every pulpit. A still more surprising development was seen, when not only in the holy cities which had witnessed the birth of Islam, but even in Baghdad itself, the home of the orthodox caliphate, the name of Mustanṣir was prayed for in the mosques.<sup>3</sup> It was but the temporary success of a Turkish general, el-Besāṣirī, that procured this unparalleled honour, and when this adventurer discovered that it was the better policy to submit to the irresistible strength of the rising Seljuk power than to build his hopes on the support which the Fātimid government had lavishly tendered, Baghdad resumed its old allegiance to the 'Abbāsids. The fact, however, that for forty Fridays the mosques of the "City of Peace" resounded with the name and style of the Egyptian caliph, and that the robe and turban and filigree throne of the rival pontiff had actually been carried off and deposited in the palace at Cairo,<sup>1</sup> caused the liveliest enthusiasm; the city was en fête, and Mustāfir spent two million dinars in furnishing the "little West Palace"—originally built by 'Aqīl for the Princess Royal—as a gilded cage for the 'Abbāsid caliph, whom he confidently expected to hold as his prisoner. Long afterwards the land beside the Nile near the "River" or "Iron" Gate was known as "the demesne of the tambur-na" (Ard-et-Tabbāla), after the estate bestowed by Mustāfir upon a singer who improvised some verses on this amazing triumph of the Fātimids and sang them to the accompaniment of her drum.

<sup>1</sup> The latest coin of el-Manṣūriya (Kāyrawān) bearing the Fātimid caliph's name, is of A.H. 438 (1046-7). Several coins, however, were struck at el-Mahdiya from 1062-5, in the name of Mustanṣir, showing a temporary return to allegiance.

<sup>2</sup> The Sicilian emirs issued their coinage solely in the names of the Fātimid caliphs, and the last dated issues are of A.H. 446 and 448? (1054-7).

<sup>3</sup> A coin of Baghdad (Medīnat-es-Selām) struck in A.H. 450 (1058-9) with the name of Mustanṣir is recorded by Fréchèr (Medīdat es-Selām, 1847).

An interesting description of Cairo and other places in Egypt by the Persian traveller Nāṣir-i-Khusrau has fortunately been preserved.<sup>2</sup> The royal city, Cairo itself (then called el-Kāhirah el-Mu'izzīya), was a very large town when he saw it in 1046 A.D.; the houses, roughly estimated at 20,000, were built chiefly of bricks so carefully joined that they looked like squared stone, to the height of five or six storeys, and separated from other houses by well-cultivated gardens and orchards, irrigated by wells and water-wheels. The rent of a moderate-sized house of four storeys was 11 D. a month (or about £70 a year), and the landlord of the house in which the traveler lodged refused 5 D. a month for the top storey.

<sup>1</sup> They remained there until the restoration of orthodoxy by Saladin, who sent back the turban and robe to Baghdad. The iron throne or lectern was retained, and eventually placed in the mosque of Beybars II.

<sup>2</sup> Safar Nāmeh: relation du voyage de Nāṣir-i-Khusrau, ed. & tr. Ch. Scheler, 1881, pp. 150—162.

All the houses in Cairo belonged to the caliph, and the rents were collected every month. The shops, which were reckoned at 30,000, were also his property, and were let at from 2*D.* to 10*D.* a month, which, even taking so low an average as 5*D.*, represents an annual income of about £630,000. The old wall of the city was no longer standing in 1048, and the second wall had not yet been begun; but the Persian traveller was struck by the high blank walls of the houses and still more of the palace, the stones of which were so closely united that they looked like a solid block. His account of the interior is disappointingly brief, but he mentions the celebrated throne-room, with its throne of gold sculptured with hunting scenes, surrounded by a golden lattice screen, and ascended by silver steps. He was told that the palace contained 10,000 people, including 12,000 servants, and that the guard mounted every night consisted of 1000 horse and foot. The city of Mifr (Fusqâ) was separated from Cairo by a space of nearly a mile, covered with gardens, flooded by the Nile in the inundation, so that in summer it looked like a sea. This was the well-known and well-loved "Lake of the Abyssinians," (Burk el-Hadash), with its surrounding gardens, a favourite resort of Cairenes, of which Ibn-Sâlih sings. "O lake of the Abyssinians, where my day was one long spell of happy peace so that Heaven seemed on thy bosom, and all my time a joyous feast. How lovely is the flax when it rises upon thee with its flowers or buds in knots, and its leaves unsheathed from thee like swords." Hard by was the monastery of St. John, with its beautiful gardens, laid out by Tariq the son of the caliph Mo'izz, and afterwards a favourite spot of the caliph Hâfiq; and the "Wall of the Steps" shaded by a giant sycamore! Mifr was built on an elevation, to escape the water, and to the Persian traveller looked "like a mountain" from a distance, with its houses of seven to fourteen storeys, standing each on a space of 30 cubits square, and capable of holding 350 people. Some of the streets were covered, and lighted by lamps. There were seven mosques in Mîr and eight in Cairo ; the number of khâns (wekâns) was reckoned at 200. A bridge of 36 boats joined Mîr to "the Island" (Rûdâ) but there was no bridge from the island to Gîza, only a ferry.

Abû-Sâlih, R. 36, qd.

The traveller was especially struck by the Market of Lamps at Mîr, where he saw rarities and works of art such as he saw in no other city, and was astonished at the profusion of fruits and vegetables in the bazaars. He describes the pottery made at Fustât as so delicate that you could see your hand through it, and remarks the metallic lustre which is still seen in fragments found in the mounds which occupy the site of the city. He also saw some fine transparent green glass made there. The shopkeepers sold "at a fixed price," and if they cheated they were put on a camel and paraded through the streets, ringing a bell and confessing their fault. All the tradespeople rode donkeys, which were on hire in every street, to the number of 30,000. Only the soldiers rode horses.

Nâṣir-i-Khuwâṣu found Egypt in a state of the utmost tranquillity and prosperity. The shops of the jewellers and money changers, he says, were left unsafeguarded, save by a cord (perhaps a net, as in the present day) stretched in front, and the people had full confidence in the government and in the amiable caliph. He saw Mustâfir riding his mule at the high festival of cutting the canal : a pleasant-looking young man, with shaven face, dressed very simply in a white kaftan and turban, with a parasol enriched with precious stones and pearls carried by a high officer. Three hundred Persians of Deylâm followed on foot, armed with halberds and axes. Eunuchs burnt incense of ambergris and aloes on either side, and the people threw themselves on their faces and called down blessings on the caliph. The chief kâfi and a crowd of doctors and officials followed, and the escort included 20,000 mounted Kitâma Berbers, 10,000 Batâlis, 20,000 blacks, 10,000 "Orientals" (Turks and Persians), 30,000 purchased slaves, 15,000 Bedawis of the Hîgâz, 30,000 black and white slave attendants and chamberlains (ustād), 10,000 palace servants (serāyī), and 30,000 negro swordsmen. Besides these (which constituted the whole army, and probably were only represented by select divisions), the caliph's suite included various princes visiting the court, from Maghrib, Yemen, Rum, Slavonia, Georgia, Nubia, Abyssinia, and even Tatars from Turkestan and the sons of the king of Delhi. Poets and men of letters, in the caliph's pay, attended ; and all Cairo and Miṣr, Christians included, turned out to see the cutting of the dam by the caliph, beside the pavilion es-Sukkara, built by his ancestor 'Aziz near the mouth, and then to go sailing on the Nile. The first boat-load was of deaf and dumb people, whose presence made an auspicious opening of the festivities. Though his descriptions relate chiefly to the capital, the Persian traveller records enough about the country, from Tinnis to Aswān, to confirm the impression that in agriculture and in general appearance it differed little from the Egypt of to-day.

The administration of el-Yazūri (1030-58), a man sprung of a humble sailor's family at Yazūr near Jaffa, who rose to be kādi of Egypt and then wezir, was characterized by an honest desire to improve the condition of the cultivators and at the same time increase the declining revenue.<sup>1</sup> A general return taken in his wezirate set forth the total receipts and expenditure in all the districts of the kingdom, and the revenue from the land-tax appeared to be only one million dinars for Egypt and the like for Syria (Makr. i. 99, 100). Yazūri attempted economic reforms, both wise and foolish. His first step was to sell the government corn reserves (worth 100,000 D. annually) at the lowest current price, instead of waiting as before for a dear market. He seems to have deprecated government speculation in the necessities of life. The result was not only a heavy loss to the treasury, but when a low Nile produced a famine soon after, there was no reserve of corn to fall back upon. As usual plague followed hard upon famine, and a thousand people are said to have died daily. In this distress the government arranged with the emperor of Constantinople for a supply of 3,000,000 bushels of grain; but the death of Constantine Monomachus in 1055, and the conditions imposed by Theodora, including an offensive and defensive alliance between the two empires, led to the withholding of the needed supply and to hostilities in northern Syria. The Byzantines had discovered, like Bevisiri, that the Seljuks were more worth conciliating than the Egyptians, and the name of the 'Abbâdîya iph, at the request of the Seljûk Sultan Tughril Beg, was now prayed for in the mosque at Constantinople. In retaliation Mustanîr laid hands upon the treasure accumulated in the newly restored Church of the Resurrection at Jerusalem.

<sup>1</sup> Sayyīd says he was allowed for a month to add his own name to that of the caliph on the coinage, but there is no numismatic confirmation of this.

Warned by failure, Yâzîrî took the opportunity of a good Nile to introduce a different system in relation to the fellahin. He put a stop to the mischievous practice of allowing merchants and usurers to buy the standing crops at a low price, ruinous to the cultivators and, like a second Joseph, he laid up immense stores of corn at Fustat as a reserve against famine.<sup>1</sup> He was not himself above the suspicion of illegal aggrandisement, unfortunately, and his extortions from the Copts were especially unjust. He threw the patriarch Christodulus into prison on a false suspicion of having influenced the Christian king of Nubia to withhold the yearly tribute. Many fines were exacted from the Copts on slight pretexts, and at Dimîr these extortions were coupled with a general closing of the churches, sonic of which were destroyed. An inscription in the name of the Trinity over the patriarch's door was erased : " You cannot efface it from my heart," was his retort. Soon after, all the churches of Egypt were ordered to be closed, the patriarch and bishops were imprisoned, and a fine of 70,000 dinars demanded. Yâzîrî was poisoned in 1028, being suspected of intrigues with Baghdađ. His inordinate wealth doubtless led to his downfall. He was a man of fine taste, a great lover of pictures, and a munificent patron of learned men.

<sup>1</sup> Ibn-Wâsimî, who died in 1309, gives the following statistics for the taxation of the different classes of land. Wheat and barley land paid 3 dirâbbs (15 bushels) per acre, up to 1173, and afterwards 2½; bread beans, 3 to 4½ dir. per acre; pea, chickpea, and lentils, 2½; flax varied, the highest amount was 3 dirâbs per acre; clover, 1 D.; lupin, 2½ D.; mallow and white beans, 3 D.; cotton, 1 D.; sugar cane, of the first growth, 5 D., later growth, 2½ D.; calotoma, 5 D.; bâlînîn (melonigena) 3 D.; indigo, 3 D.; vines and fruit trees in the fourth year, 3 D. There is no mention of rice, or maize, or dhura in the list; but it does not profess to be complete. In the present day the value of the winter crops averages £7 an acre.

<sup>149</sup> After Yâzîrî, wezirs came and went like ministers of a modern republic. There were forty changes in nine years, but by this time it had been discovered that it was not absolutely necessary to kill a deposed wezir, and it became usual to confer upon him some lower office, from which he often rose to the top rank again. Some of these wezirs held office three or four times, and a change of ministry did not necessarily involve a massacre. These frequent changes were due to the incompetence of the caliph and the factious composition of the court and army. Mustansîr was in the hands of all sorts of nobodies, who gave him conflicting counsels, distracted his experienced officials, and left him more perplexed than ever. Eight hundred letters a day testihed to the grievances of his subjects and the weak vacillation of their sovereign, open to every influence and impression, however base and interested. A curious story is related of his irritability. He was one day superintending a murderous bastinadoing of a wezir, when the black dowager remonstrated, and told her son that killing a man was not the best way to make him disgorge his wealth, but if he would hand over the wezir to her, she knew how to squeeze him. The caliph thereupon rose in great wrath, and marched off towards the mosque of 'Amr. His chamberlains pursued, wondering what this new proceeding meant. Mustansîr told them that as everybody thwarted him and kept him in leading strings he was resolved to throw up the government and retire to the mosque and devote the rest of his life to religion. The thought, however, of the pillage that would at once destroy his beautiful palace brought him back to reason, and the chamberlains persuaded him to return. His religious yearnings were not deep-seated, if the story be true that in his palaces at Heliopolis he erected a pavilion in imitation of the Ka'ba of Mecca, and laid out a pond full of wine to represent the sacred well of Zamzam, and there sat and drank to the sounds of stringed music and singers, saying, "This is pleasanter than staring at a black stone, listening to the drone of the mureddhün, and drinking bad water!" In such pleasures he consoled himself for the lack of all power and dignity. That he was not wanting in kindly feeling, however, is shown by the following story. Every year the usual pension-list amounting to between 100,000 D. and 200,000 D., was laid before him for his revision. On one occasion he did not strike out a single pensioner's name, but with his own hand endorsed the list with this comment : "Poverty is a sore diet, and want bows the neck. Our anxiety for their welfare is shown in a generous distribution of help, let them therefore have their shares liberally. What ye possess will be spent, what is given to God lasts for ever."

Meanwhile the jealousy between the Turkish troops and the Sudan battalions, favoured by their country-woman, the caliph's mother, grew to alarming proportions. A broil led to a general engagement, and the Turks, supported by the Kātāma and other Berbers, drove the blacks, to the number of 50,000, out of Cairo into Upper Egypt, whence for several years they repeatedly advanced by land and water to attack their enemy. The Turks, however, had the upper hand in the capital, in spite of the dowager's intrigues, and they used their power in despoiling the palace and emptying the treasury, terrifying the changing wazirs, and treating the caliph with contempt. Instead of 28,000 D. they now drew 400,000 D. a month from the treasury in pay and allowances. Their leader, Niṣr-ed-dawla b. Ḥamḍān, commander-in-chief of the Fāmid army, carried matters with so high a hand that at last he alienated his own colleagues and officers, who induced the helpless caliph to dismiss him from his post. The deposed general made them all pay dearly for their revolt. Though obliged to fly from his enemies in Cairo, he had Alexandria in his power, and quickly obtained the support of some Arab tribes and of the Lewita Berbers. The caliph had shown some spirit during this disturbance, and had even appeared in mail at the head of such troops as remained loyal, by whose aid he had defeated Nasir-ed-dawla; but his authority was now limited to his capital. The black regiments held all Upper Egypt, and 40,000 horsemen of the Lewita overran the delta, and abandoned the dikes and canals to destruction, with the open intention of starving the inhabitants. Cairo and Fustat were cut off from supplies, and a terrible famine which had begun with the low Nile of 1065, and lasted unbroken for seven years (1066-72), brought the country to the utmost pitch of misery. The fellahs, in terror of the armed bands that infested the land, dared not carry on their work, and the usual effects of a bad Nile were thus prolonged to successive years. In the capital, cut off from all communication with the provinces, the famine was felt in the greatest severity. A cake of bread was sold for 15 D., though an ardebb (five bushels) of corn could be bought for 100 D., a house was exchanged for 20 lbs. of flour, an egg went for a dinar. Horses and asses were eaten, a dog fetched 5 D., a cat 3 D., till soon there was not an animal to be seen. The caliph's own stable, which once held 10,000 horses and mules, was reduced to three nags, and when he rode abroad his escort, on foot, fainted with hunger. At last, people began to eat each other. Passengers were caught in the streets by hooks let down from the windows, drawn up, killed, and cooked. Human flesh was sold in public. Horrible tales are recorded of the atrocities of that reign of terror, and though examples were made of some of the criminals, the feeble government could make no head against the maddened populace. Plague came to finish what famine had begun, and whole houses were emptied of every living soul in twenty-four hours.

The rich suffered almost as much as the poor. Gay courtiers sought employment as grocers and sweepers. A man went to a bath, and the manager asked him whether he would prefer to be served by Izz-ed-dawla, or Fakhr-ed-dawla, or Sa'd-ed-dawla—three of the great wazirs of the day, who now undertook his shampooing. Ladies of rank tried vainly to sell their jewels or bread, and threw away their useless pearls and emeralds in the street. One lady, who contrived with great difficulty to secure a handful of flour in exchange for a necklace worth 1000 D., made a little cake and brandished it before the crowd, crying "O people of Cairo, pray for our lord the caliph, whose reign brings us such blessing and prosperity! Thanks to him, this cake cost me 1000 dinars." Mustansir was roused for a moment from the lethargy in which he was sunk, and compelled the merchants, who had "cornered" the wheat stores, to desgorge and sell to the people at a moderate price; but he could do little. His own vast means were exhausted. Of all the caliphs none had approached him in wealth. Two extremely aged princesses, daughters of his ancestor Mo'izz, had died in 1050 (see p. 111), and left him the treasures for which four caliphs had successively sighed. Their wealth amounted to millions. The inventory of Mustansir's treasures recorded by Maqrizi reads like a fable in 'the Thousand and One Nights';<sup>1</sup> yet all these exquisite

<sup>1</sup> Some of the items are interesting as evidence of the art and luxury of the times. Omitting precious stones (such as a box containing 7 madd, or 10 lb., of emeralds, worth 300,000 D.; 7 weyks, or 250 lb., of fine pearls, ruby rings, etc.), the inventory included thousands of large crystal vases, some engraved with the name of 'Ali; gold plates inlaid and enamelled in colour, cups of brass engraved with the name of Hārun ar-Rashid; inkstands of gold, silver, ebony, ivory, aloes and other woods, carved, inlaid, and jewelled; great porcelain jars full of camphor of Keyser; cups of amber, phials of musk; large wash-tube on three legs in form of animals, worth 1000 D. apiece; white China eggs (for warming the hands, perhaps); the gold mattress on which the caliph Nāṣirūn had slept on an interesting occasion; enamelled plates presented by the Roman emperor to 'Ali; steel mirrors; glass and pottery innumerable; parasols with gold and silver bases; chased and inlaid silver vessels of all shapes, chess and draught boards of silk embroidered and priceless works of art had been dissipated among the barbarous Turks during the tyranny of Nâṣr-ed-dawla. They had forced the caliph to sell everything, and then bought the treasures at an absurd forced price. Jewellery which had cost 600,000 D. was sold for 20,000, emeralds valued at 300,000 went to a Turkish general for 200; often there was not even the pretence of a sale, but a scene of open looting. One of the valuers stated that at the lowest reckoning the treasures sold in a single fortnight of December, 1067, were worth 30,000,000 D. The costly collections of the "Treasury of the Flags" were destroyed by a torch dropped by a follower of one in gold with paws of gold, silver, ivory and ebony; green gold robes for駁駁服 were at 2000 for mantelets, at 1000 francs and other toys made of amber and cornophore; a jewelled turban valued at 130,000 D., the stones of which weighed 17 lbs.; perfumes in vast masses; a gold peacock with ruby eyes and enamelled feathers; a gold cock, whose comb and eyes were made of rubies; a gauze covered with pearls, a table of sardonyx, a gold palm tree with bases of precious stones. The forty-eight state bages or dabalâys for Nile processions included one made for the caliph by order of the work Gargash at a cost of 15,000 D., and the "silver barge" of the black dervishes presented to her by her former master, Abu-Sâlih. The robes and embroideries, velvets and other stuffs, included red damask brocaded with gold in the design of parks where elephants roamed, with embroidered with the history of the dynasties of the east and portraits of famous men, with their dates and deeds, the carpet made for Mâlik al-Tâistar, depicting a map of the world as mountains, rivers, cities, where Mesha and Median were clearly recognisable, stuffs of Dîlik Râsimî, Rehîm, Demasî, China, another like and preceding; immense collections of jewelled daggers, scimitars, khâlangîs, etc., khatt-lances, and arms of all sorts, including the sword of 'Amr b. Mâlik al-Khâlid of Alîya of Hûm, the scimitar of Tugay, the shield of Hamza and even the famous 'Uthâlâtîr "the Fertilizer of the Prophet Mohammed himself. The tent of gold brocade and silk were sometimes worked with pictures of men and animals and birds, and supported by gilt poles, one specially large tent, made for Yâkût at a cost of 30,000 D., has a pole 65 cubits high, and a circumference of 30 cubits, and required 100 mules to transport it with its furniture. It was covered with designs, and took 30 armenian years to make. The caliph Zâhir's tent was of pure gold thread, supported on six silver pillars, another made at Aleppo and costing 30,000 D., was supported by the tallest mast of a Venetian galley, another was called "the slayer," because it invariably killed one or two men in striking. — Majnûn.

of the Turkish goths—collections which had been formed at a cost of 70,000 or 80,000 D a year for a century past.

But the most irreparable loss of that reign of brigandage was the dispersion of the caliph's library of over 100,000 books on every branch of learning and belles-lettres known to the Arabs. They were stored in locked presses round the room, with labels to indicate the contents of each press. The library staff seems to have consisted of only a librarian, two copyists, and two servants. Among the manuscripts were 2400 illuminated Korans, books in the handwriting of Isha-Mukta and other famous calligraphers, thirty copies of the great Arabic dictionary called the Wâjîh, twenty copies of Tabari's history, including the author's autograph copy, a hundred copies of Ibn Dureyd's Gumhâra and innumerable works of incomparable value. All these were sold or carried off by the Turks on pretext of arrears of pay, save only the private library of the harim. Rare manuscripts, which scholars would give anything to possess now, went to light the fires; their bindings mended the shoes of the Turkish officers' slaves. Many torn volumes were thrown aside and got buried under the sand, and the "hills of the books" were long known near Abyâr. The most fortunate were those that were exported to other countries. It says much for the literary zeal of the Fâtimids that in spite of this lamentable destruction, they set about collecting books with so much energy that Saladin found at least 120,000 volumes in their library a century later.

These forced sales and robberies of his treasures had reduced the unhappy caliph Mustâsim to the depths of misery. Nâṣir-ed-dawla held the caliph and the remnant of the garrison besieged in Cairo and Fusṭât, and reduced to such straits by famine and fear that the soldiers were looting the houses, the people flying by night, and the caliph's own household dying or fled. In 1070 his daughters and their mother took refuge, even in Baghdad, to escape starvation. There was nothing for it but to make terms with the rebels, but even then the Turks fell out among themselves, and Nâṣir ed-dawla burnt and sacked part of Fusṭât, and after defeating Mustâsim's little army, who made a good fight, entered Cairo. The rebel's messenger found the caliph in his empty palace, seated on a common mat, attended by three slaves. A daughter of the celebrated grammarian Ibn-Bibshūn charitably sent him two loaves a day. To such a pass had the famine and the Turkish despoilers reduced the Commander of the Faithful.

At last a state of things which could not be worse began to mend. A plentiful harvest in 1073 put an end to the famine that had wasted Egypt for seven years. In the same year Nāṣir-ed-dawla was assassinated by some jealous rivals, and his body sent in pieces to various cities of the empire. The change of keepers, from one Turk to another, did little to improve the government of the country, but when the caliph, at his wits' end, sent for the governor of 'Akka (Acre) to take command, a complete change came over the face of affairs. Bedr el-Gemali, an Armenian slave of the emir Gamil-ed-din b. 'Amīnah, had risen to high office in the Syrian wars, had twice been governor of Damascus, and had successfully fought the Turks till he had become the most powerful general in Syria. He accepted Al-Mustansir's appeal, only on condition that he brought with him his hardy Syrian troops—"the Easterns" as they were called, in distinction from the Turkish, Berber, and Sādāt regiments of Egypt. Despising the risks of a sea-voyage in winter, when scarcely any one dared to put to sea off that coast, he sailed from

Fig. 31.—Inscription of Bedr el-Gemali in mosque of Ibn-Tūlūn, 1077.

'Akka in December, 1073, reached Tunis with a favouring wind in four days, and landed at Damietta. On his approach the caliph summoned up courage to arrest the Turkish commander Ildeguz. Bedr then entered Cairo at the beginning of February. The Turks received him with cordiality, not knowing that he had been sent for. Each Turkish general was allotted as a victim to one or other of the Syrian officers, and next morning each of them appeared before Bedr, as was arranged, with a Turk's head in his hands. The detestable despotism was abolished in a night.

The caliph, overjoyed at his release from his oppressors, loaded his deliverer with honours, named him Amir el-Guyush or commander-in-chief, and presently added all the civil offices of state. He was, in fact, endowed with the full supreme government, and became the alter ego of the caliph. Bedr established himself in the Bargawān street, and set about restoring order, executing all possible rivals, and recovering for his master as much as could be discovered of the palace property. When this was done he began the reduction of the provinces; slaughtered or subdued the Lewīta Berbers in the delta, and took Alexandria by storm, marched into Upper Egypt, where the blacks and the Arab tribes had long done as they pleased, and restored the caliph's authority as far as Aawān. The captives were so numerous that a woman could be bought for a dinar, and a horse for half as much again. After this ruthless and sanguinary beginning, all was quiet. The selāḥin under his strong, just, and benevolent rule, soon began to enjoy a security and prosperity unknown for many years. In 1090 a return of taxation ordered by Bedr el-Gemili showed that the revenue of Egypt and Syria had risen from the usual 2,000,000 or at most 2,800,000, to 3,100,000 D.<sup>1</sup> Indeed the remaining twenty years of Mustansir's reign saw nothing but peace and plenty in Egypt, though in Syria there was continual war, which threatened at one time to break over the frontier. For the first time since the reign of 'Aziz, Cairo became the home of architects. A new brick wall was built round the palace-city ; the three great stone gates, the Bāb-en-Naṣr, Bāb-el-Futūḥ (1087), and Bāb Zawila or Zuweyla (1091) were removed and rebuilt within the new wall, and assumed the imposing appearance they wear to this day. The three gates are stated to have been the work of three brothers, architects, from Edessa, each of whom built a gate.<sup>1</sup> As has been seen, Yuzūrī and others employed artists from Mesopotamia and Irāq, and there is nothing improbable in Bedr importing architects from Edessa, which was full of his Armenian fellow-countrymen. According to Abū-Ṣalih, however, the gates and the new wall were planned by "John the Monk" (f. 51e) : but "planning" or designing (the Arabic word is explicit) does not include building,

<sup>1</sup> This, if it refers to the land tax of Egypt alone, is probably the same return as that cited by Abu-Sa'id (E. 88-90) as having been made

"in the days of the kādī el-Kahhāl" (i.e. Ibn-el-Kahhāl, c. 1090), the details of which (for 1276 districts and 890 villages) are as follows.—

Northern Provinces.	Dinārs.	Southern Provinces.	Dinārs
Esh-Sharkiya . . . .	694,121	El-G'īlīya . . . .	129,641
El-Murtabīya . . . .	70,358	El-Affāhīya . . . .	39,449
Ed-Dakshīliya . . . .	53,701	El-Busīriya . . . .	39,390
El-Abwāmīya . . . .	4,700	El-Fayyāmīya . . . .	145,162
G'ezīrat-Kūsāniya . . . .	159,664	El-Behnēsā'iya . . . .	234,801
El-Qāribīya . . . .	430,953	El-Ushmūneyn and Ṭalāt 27,676
Es-Semennūdiya . . . .	200,657	Es-Suyūtiya [etc.]	[304,834?]
El-Menūsiyatayn . . . .	140,933
Fūwa, etc. . . . .	6,080	Total . . . .	1,020,953
En-Nestariwiya . . . .	14,910
Rosetta, etc. . . . .	3,000	Total of North and
G'ezīrat-Beni-Naṣr . . . .	62,508	South	3,060,993 D.
El-Buhayra . . . .	139,313
Hawf Ramsis . . . .	[59,080 ?]
Total . . . .	2,640,040

This estimate admittedly excludes the revenue from Alexandria, Damietta, and Tinnis on the northern coast, and Kūf and Nekāda (i.e. the provinces of Kūsāya and Ikhmūmīya) in Upper Egypt, the revenues of which are estimated at 60,000 D. Abū-Ṣalih adds that in the reign of el-Amir a poll-tax of 1½ D. was imposed, which was raised to 2 D. by Rūḍwīn, a wazīr of el-Ilāhīz, no ed for his oppression of Christians.

<sup>1</sup> Maqrīzī, i. 381.

and it is possible that the monk and the Edessa architects co-operated. The Edessa origin explains, as no Coptic source alone could do, the Byzantine appearance of these massive gateways. Edessa was long an outpost of the Roman empire against the caliphs, and its architects must have been well acquainted with the military architecture of Byzantium. Nor could Bedr el-Gemali himself, after his long wars in Syria, have been ignorant of the buildings of the mediæval Romans.<sup>1</sup>

Fig. 32 — Gate of Zawila, Cairo, 1091.

<sup>1</sup> See M. van Berchem, Notes d'archéologie arabe, in Journ. Anat., 1891.

During these twenty years the great Armenian who had rescued Mustanqir from the Turks kept his weak and pleasure-loving sovereign completely under his control. When Bedr el-Gemalid died in the spring of 1094 at the age of eighty, his son Aba-l-Kasim Shâhanshâh succeeded to his power with the title of El-Afslâl. The caliph, who had seen such terrible vicissitudes of fortune, and deserved all his troubles, did not long survive his trusty minister. Mustanqir died at the end<sup>1</sup> of December, in his sixty-eighth year and the sixty-first of his inglorious reign.

Before relating the causes which led to the fall of the Fatimid caliphate, some account may be given of the machinery of their administration. Arabic historians are usually wanting in this class of information, which they take for granted as familiar to their readers, and it is difficult to obtain any precise statement about the details of government under the early Arab and Turkish governors. For the Fatimid period, however, we possess a systematic outline of the military and administrative system, which, so far as it goes, is useful.<sup>2</sup>

The army was divided into three principal ranks : 1. Emirs, who were subdivided into (a) gold-chain emirs, the highest class ; (b) sword-bearers, who escorted the caliph on horseback ; (c) ordinary officers. 2. The officers of the guard, consisting of (a) the masters (wâlids) or eunuchs, who were held in high honour and given important posts ; (b) the "young guard," a body of about 500 picked youths of family, and (c) the troops of the caliph's barracks, to the number of about 2000. 3. The regiments, each named after some caliph or vezir or

<sup>1</sup> 28th of Dhâl-l-Hijja, A.H. 487, or 29th Dec., 1094. A coin of Alexandria bearing the date 488 must have been issued probably on the 1st of January, before the news of the caliph's death was known there.

<sup>2</sup> El-Kalkashandi translated by Wustenfeld, Die Geographie und Verwaltung von Ägypten (1879), pp. 171-222. Kalkashandi was a contemporary of al-Mâlikî, but like the latter he had access to a large number of earlier authorities and documents of the Fatimid period. He also gives a long and curious account of the sumptuous court ceremonies and pageants.

according to its nation, as the H̄is̄̄iya, G'uyūshiya, R̄umiya (Romans, i.e. Greeks), Ṣak̄liba (Slavs), Sūdāniya (blacks). The number of regiments was very large, and varied at different times. The pay ranged from 2 D. to 20 D. a month.

The fleet, which was stationed at Alexandria, Damietta, Ascalon and other Syrian ports, and Ayyubāb on the Red Sea, numbered over seventy five galleys ten transports, and ten galleasses, under a high admiral.

Fig. 33.—Gate of Victory (Bab-en Nasr), Cairo, 1087.

The official ministers of the caliphate were divided into two classes, the "Men of the Sword" and the "Men of the Pen."

The men of the sword superintended the army and war office, and consisted in 1. The wezir (unless he were a civil man of the pen). 2. The "lord of the door," or high chamberlain, who stood next to the wezir, and was sometimes called the lesser wezir, and enjoyed the privilege of presenting ambassadors. 3. The field marshal (isfensâbir) or commander-in-chief, who commanded the whole of the forces, and looked to the protection of the palace. 4. The umbrella-bearer, a great emir, who carried the parasol of state over the caliph. 5. The sword-bearer. 6. The lance-bearer. 7. The equerries. 8. The commandant of Cairo. 9. The commandant of Mîr (Fustât). To the men of the sword belonged also the household attendants, stewards, chamberlains, ink-bearer, and various court functionaries.

The men of the pen included (besides the vezir unless he belonged to the military order): 1. The chief kâfi, endowed with very great powers, the head of the law, director of the mint, who held his court in the mosque of 'Amr on Tuesdays and Saturdays, seated on a raised divan, with his inkstand before him, the witnesses ranged on either hand in the order of their causes, four lawyers seated in front, and five ushers to keep order. 2. The chief preacher, who presided in the hall of science. 3. The inspector of markets (mabtesib), who held unrestricted control over the bazaars and streets, assisted by two deputies for Cairo and Mîr, supervised weights and measures, prices, and trade generally, and punished cheats and defaulters. 4. The treasurer, who presided over the Beyt el-Mâl or state treasury, and had besides various duties, such as manumitting and marrying slaves, making contracts for building ships, etc. 5. The deputy chamberlain, who joined the "lord of the door" in introducing an ambassador to the caliph, each holding one of his hands, and never letting him loose. 6. The reader, who recited the Korân to the caliph, in season and out of season.

A lower division of the men of the pen comprised the whole body of civil servants, attached to the following departments. 1. The vezirate (unless the vezir were a man of the sword). 2. The chancery, subdivided into the secretariate and the two branches of the record office or registry of the caliph's acts, one to take down and draft his instructions, the other to write them out in fair copy. 3. The army pay office, which also attended to the proper mounting and furnishing of the troops. 4. The exchequer, subdivided into fourteen departments, dealing with every branch of the finances, accounts, allowances, presents, pensions, tribute, crown inheritance, royal factories, with special bureaux for Upper Egypt, Alexandria, etc. The physicians, of whom the caliph always kept four or five, and the poets, whose name was legion, also formed separate classes of the men of the pen attached to the court.

Outside these court functionaries were the local officials who governed the three divisions of the empire, Egypt, Syria, and the borders of Asia Minor. Egypt was administered by the four governors of Kūṣ, or Upper Egypt, Sharqīya (Bilbeys, Kalyob, Ushmāni), Gharbiya (Mahalla, Menūf, and Abyun), and Alexandria (including all Bulheyra). The governor of Upper Egypt ranked almost next to the wezir, and had several deputy governors under him in the various provinces. Under these were the district officials and heads of towns and villages. The management of all local affairs was entrusted to the local authorities, including the maintenance by troops and corvée labour of the irrigation canals and dams belonging specifically to the district or village; but the larger dikes, which could not be assigned to one local authority, were managed by inspectors appointed annually from Cairo, with a large staff of skilled assistants. The system reads well on paper, but in practice there was doubtless much corruption and peculation. The general testimony of the Arabic historians, however, points to a mild and even benevolent treatment of the fellāḥin as the prevailing policy of the Fāṭimid government.

CHAPTER VI

THE ATTACK FROM THE EAST

969-1171

Authorities. As preceding; also Osima, Bahā'ud-dīn, William of Tyre.

Memoirs, Inscriptions, Coins, &c.—See preceding chapter.

SYRIA had been a dependency of Egypt, with brief intermission, since the days of Ibn-Tālūn, but under the Fātimids the connection had been growing more and more strained. The orthodox inhabitants, especially in Damascus, strenuously repudiated the Shī'a heresy, and could be induced only by force to recognize the caliphs of Egypt. The Fātimid conquest by Gā'far b. Fellāḥ in 969 was immediately followed by revolt, and the intervention of the Karmālis practically severed Syria from Egypt for the next eight years. Even after the caliph 'Azzīz in person had led a successful campaign in 977, and quashed the insurrection under Aftegīn, Damascus was still but nominally under the control of Egypt, and it was not till 988 that the Syrian capital was thoroughly subdued for the time.<sup>1</sup> The northernmost city of the Fātimid empire was then Tripoli<sup>2</sup>; Antioch still belonged to the eastern Roman empire; and Aleppo was in the possession of the last descendants of the <sup>1</sup> The earliest Fātimid coinage at Tripoli dates from 974-5; the latest is 1101-2. But the Syrian coinage of the Fātimids was too intermittent (or too few examples have come down) for it to be taken as a chronological guide. The most regular mints were Filastīn (i.e. Ramla), Tyre, and Tripolis. Under al-Amīr, when Syria had nearly all fallen to the Crusaders, 'Akjālān (Acalon) became the Syrian mint of the Fātimids, 1109-17.

Hamdānids, ever sworn foes to Egypt, and protected by the Romans as a necessary buttress to Antioch, which the emperor Nicephorus had recently recovered from the Arabs (960). When Mañūtegin, the Fatimid general, besieged Aleppo for thirteen months in 992-4, after defeating an army of 50,000 men despatched to its relief ~~by~~ by the Roman governor of Antioch, the emperor Basil II himself, abandoning a campaign against the Bulgarians, came to its support. At his approach the Egyptians retired on Damascus, and the emperor sacked Hims and Sheyzar and made an unsuccessful attack on Tripoli. A parade of 250 Roman prisoners at Cairo was the only triumph enjoyed on this occasion by the caliph 'Aziz.

Under Hākim, after two victories over the Romans, by sea off Tyre and by land near Apamea, peace was concluded for ten years with the emperor: but Syria ~~was~~ remained in a chronic state of revolt. Tyre had to be reduced, and the G'arrāh family at Ramia set up a rival camp in the sheref of Mekka, with the title of cr-Rashid; defeated the Fatimid army near Dārām; and were with difficulty brought to some degree of submission by judicious bribes and diplomacy. Notunally, the Egyptian caliph acquired some prestige by the acknowledgment of his sovereignty in the mosques of the Euphrates valley, from Mōṣil to Kafṣa, by the Arab ('Okeyhid) ruler Kirwish; but this temporary adhesion ~~was~~ was summarily severed by the Buwayhid sultan of Irak. Nor was the brief accession of Aleppo to the Fatimid party in 1011, when the Hamdanids were expelled by their freedman, Ibn-Lurlu, of much value. Such homage was in reality in the nature of an appeal for help against some pressing danger.

On the accession of Zāhir, the authority of the ~~new~~ Egyptian government was scarcely felt in Syria. The capable commander of their army, Anṣahtegin ed-Dizbīrī, the governor of Caesarea, had to face an insurrection under Ḥassān b. Daghfal in Palestine, another under Sinān around Damascus, and the hostility of Sāliḥ b. Mardīs, who took Aleppo in 1025 from the Princess Royal's Indian slave Firuz, by whom the city had been held for the last three years. Anushtegin at last defeated and killed Salih at the battle of Ushuwanah near Tiberias, drove Hassan into exile among the Romans, and restored most of Syria, except the north, to the Egyptian caliph. Another defeat of the Mirdāsid Arabs on the Orontes, near Sheyzar, gave Aleppo<sup>1</sup> and the rest of northern Syria, except the Roman territory, to his master the child caliph Mustanqir, and Anushtegīn's firm rule not only preserved peace and order in Damascus, but induced the governor of Harran, by the Euphrates, to proclaim the caliphate of Egypt in the mosques of Harran, Sarug and Rakka. Meanwhile a ten years' peace had been concluded with the emperor Michael IV, who was allowed to complete the restoration of the ruined Church of the Resurrection in 1048.

<sup>1043</sup> The government of Anushtegin marks high-water in the Fatimid relations with Syria. From 1043 their power rapidly declined. The new governor, Nujir-ed-dawla b. Hamdān, afterwards notorious in Egypt, found himself powerless at Damascus; Palestine was once more in revolt under Hassan; and two attempts to recover Aleppo from the Mirdāsids, in 1048 and 1049, proved fruitless though 30,000 Egyptian troops were sent in the second year. It is true the Mirdāsid Mo'izz-ed-dawla afterwards submitted, sent the caliph 40,000 D, and presently made his home at Cairo;<sup>2</sup> but his nephew carried on the struggle in 1060, after which Aleppo was never a Fatimid city.

A greater power, however, was rapidly advancing from the east, which merged all minor contests in a struggle for bare existence. The Seljuk Turkmans had subdued Persia and in 1055 their leader, Tughril Beg, was recognized at Baghdad in the Friday prayers as the caliph's lieutenant, or in other words master. The Seljuks were sternly orthodox and zealous for the faith.

<sup>1</sup> There is a coin of Aleppo, A.H. 429 (1037-8), with the name of Mustanqir, in the Bibliothèque nationale at Paris.

<sup>2</sup> Coins of Aleppo from 1050 to 1055 bear the name of the caliph Mustanqir.

to extirpate the Egyptian heresy was their sacred duty. To reduce Syria, as a first step, was no very difficult task, in its divided and rebellious state. The Seljuk general Atsiz conquered Palestine and entered Jerusalem in 1071 and after laying siege to Damascus annually for five years and destroying the crops around, at last, with the connivance of one of its inveterate factions, acquired the city in 1076. Damascus never again belonged to the Fatimids.<sup>1</sup> The only capable leader in Egypt, Bedr el-Gemali, was fully occupied in recovering the Nile valley for his indolent master, and had no force to spare for Syria. He bribed Atsiz to abstain from crossing the frontier—he had advanced as far as Gaza and el-Arish, the border town—and meanwhile prepared ships to convey the Fatimid court to Alexandria if the worst should happen. Had Atsiz been adequately supported from the east, the fears of the great vizir might have been realized, and the Seljuk might have extinguished the Shi'a dynasty a hundred years before its actual fall. As it was, as soon as Egypt was pacified, the troops were free to be employed in Syria, and Damascus was at once besieged. The Egyptians had to retire on the approach of Tutsuh (the brother of Melik Shah, the greatest of the Seljuk sultans), who was appointed viceroy in Syria and entered Damascus in 1079. Still undaunted, Bedr himself, despite his seventy years, led a fresh campaign against the invaders in 1083, but his siege of Damascus was equally fruitless. He lived, however, to see some minor successes on the coast, where the Fatimid armies sent by his order took Tyre, which had been many years in revolt, and re-conquered 'Akka and Gubayl.

The deaths of Bedr el-Gemali and the caliph Mustanir made little difference in the situation. Bedr was succeeded in the vizirate by his son el-Alid al-Shahanshah, who hastily set the youngest of the seven sons of the late caliph on the throne with the title of el-Musta'il (1094—1101).<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The latest Fatimid coin of Damascus bears the date 1066-7.

<sup>2</sup> Abu'l-Kham Ahmad el-Musta'il-bi-llah, "the exalted of God," struck coins at Mifri (1095—1100-1), Alexandria, 'Akka, Tyre, and Tripoli (1101).

He thought a youth of eighteen more amenable to management than a mature man. The eldest son Nizir, who was close upon fifty, naturally resented this supersession, and set himself up at Alexandria, with the el-Mustafa', and governor's approval, as the Imam el-Mustafa', and although he was forced to surrender a year later and vanished in his brother's prisons, he was long revered as the true Imam and head of the Shi'a by the Isma'ilis, especially by the "Assassins" of Persia. On Mustafa's death at the close of 1101 his son el-Amîr<sup>2</sup> († c. 1131), a child of five, was duly enthroned by el-Afdal, who had a little seat made on the pommel of his own saddle and rode through Cairo with the baby caliph seated in front. The wezir's power was now absolute, and for twenty years he governed Egypt as he pleased, as his father had done before him. Indeed from 1074 to 1121 these two great Armenians were, in all but name, kings of Egypt, and to their mild just rule, as much as to their energy and firm control, the country owed half a century of internal quiet and prosperity.

Fig. 34.—Dinâr of el-Musta's, Tripolis, 1101.

<sup>1</sup> E. Imam el-Muqtâfa-bî dîn-llâh. Coins were issued in his name by the Assassins of Alâmu', who pretended to be his descendants; one is in the Hermitage at St. Petersburg, with the mint Karat-Sarîn, "the Golden Throne," and date 4695 A.H. A reputed son of Nizir is said to have struck coins as caliph in the Yemen with the title Imam Mohammed b. Nâir. He was crucified at Cairo with the ex-wezir Ma'mûn and his five brothers in 1128. Another son, el-Iâsim, raised an army in Maghrib (Barka, perhaps), and was defeated and killed by Hâfiq's troops.

<sup>2</sup> Abû-'Ali el-Mansûr el-Amîr-bî-aklîm-llâh, "the ruler by the decrees of God." His coins were issued at Miqîr (1101-30), el-Mo'izzîya el-Kâhira (Cairo, 1114-30), Alexandria (1101-30), Kût (1123-4), Ascalon (1109-16), and Tyre (1102-23). The epithet el-Mo'izzîya ("of Might") applied to Cairo is also used by Nâsir-i-Khusrau in 1046.

The one engrossing topic of Alâîl's rule was the danger from the east. Not from the Selgûks, for on the deaths of Melik Shih (1002) and Tûtûsh (1022) their empire broke into fragments, and the war of succession that

Fig. 35.—Coin Weight of al-Anur

paralyzed their influence in Persia was echoed by a lesser rivalry between the sons of Tûtûsh, one of whom (Dukâk) held Damascus, whilst the other (Rugwân) ruled at Aleppo and even had the Fatimid's name proclaimed in the mosques in the hope of winning Egyptian support against his brother. But though the Selgûk power was broken in Syria the impulse that brought them westward was still strong, and numerous bodies of hasty Turkomans were gathered round the standards of daring chiefs, trained in the Selgûk wars, and ready to embark on fresh conquests whenever a fresh leader should appear who could unite them for a common purpose. Meanwhile, in the lull between the Selgûk hurricane and the gathering storm which was to break upon Egypt in the armies of Nûr-ed-din, a new force appeared which at first threatened to carry all before it.

The temporary paralysis of the Muhammadan dynasties in Persia and Syria, and the degenerate luxuriousness of the Fatimids in Egypt offered an opportunity for invasion. In 1096 "the first Crusade began its eastward march"; in 1098 the great cities of Edessa and Antioch and many fortresses were taken; in 1099 the Christians regained possession of Jerusalem itself. In the next few years the greater part of Palestine and the coast of Syria, Tortosa, Akka, Tripolis, and Sidon (1110) fell into the hands of the Crusaders, and the conquest of Tyre in 1124 marked the apogee of their power. It was the precise moment when a successful invasion from Europe was possible. A generation earlier, the Selgûk power was impregnable. A generation later, a Zengî or a Nûr-ed-din, firmly established in the Syrian seats of the Selgûks, would probably have driven the invaders into the sea. A lucky star led the preachers of the first Crusade to seize an opportunity of which they hardly realized the significance. Peter the Hermit and Urban II chose the auspicious moment with a sagacity as unerring as if they had made a profound study of Asiatic politics. The Crusade penetrated like a wedge between the old wood and the new, and for a while seemed to cleave the trunk of Mohammedan empire into splinters.<sup>1</sup>

When the news of the approaching Crusade reached Egypt, Afdal welcomed it as a source of strength against the Seljuks, and seems to have even anticipated an alliance with the Christians against the common enemy.<sup>2</sup> Emboldened by the prospect he marched into Palestine and took Jerusalem after more than a month's siege from its Seljuk commandants, the brothers Sukman and II-Ghazi.<sup>3</sup> The dismissal of these valiant defenders only paved the way for the Crusaders, and when the Christian conquerors massacred 70,000 defenceless Muslims in the Holy City, Afdal at last understood what he had to expect from his presumed allies. He received a further lesson when the Franks surprised him before Ascalon, and attacking the Egyptians, in spite of a flag of truce, utterly routed them, captured their camp and baggage, and set fire to a wood in which many of the fugitives had sought refuge. Afdal sailed hurriedly for Egypt, and Ascalon bribed the Franks to leave it alone. So long as he lived, however, the Armenian went waged war against the invaders. In 1101 the Crusaders were again victorious near Jaffa, but in 1102 an Egyptian army, composed probably of some of Bedr's Syrian veterans, had their full revenge near Ascalon, defeated Baldwin and 700 knights, and compelled the king of Jerusalem to take refuge in a bed of rushes, whence he was smoked out and hunted as far as Jaffa. Ramla once more became a Saracen city. In the following year, several engagements took place. Afdal sent his son, who beat the

<sup>1</sup> Lane-Poole, Seljuk, 24, 25.

<sup>2</sup> He may even have proposed to become a Christian in order to cement the alliance. Cf. Hist. des Croisades, iv. 48, 78.

<sup>3</sup> They afterwards founded the Ortoqid dynasties at Mardin and Heyfa in Diyar-Bekr, one of which subsisted to the time of Tamerl.

Franks at Yârûr (when Baldwin hid in a haystack), took Ramla, and sent 300 knights as prisoners to Egypt, after killing the rest. A force of 4000 Egyptian horse was sent to Jaffa the same year, supported by a fleet : but the Crusaders were also reinforced, and no effort of the Egyptians could arrest their progress. By 1104 most of Palestine was in Christian hands, except a few coast fortresses, and of these 'Akka and Gîbel fell in that year. The struggle centred round Ramla for some time, and the Atâbeg or Seljuk governor of Damascus, Tughtigin, made common cause with the Fatimids in endeavouring to save the remnant of Muslim power in the Holy Land, but after an indecisive battle between Jaffa and Ascalon in September, 1104, both sides retired exhausted. After 1109, when Tripoli at length fell after an heroic siege,<sup>162</sup> Tyre became the hope of Islam and resisted all attempts of the Crusaders until 1124, when Ascalon remained the northern outpost of Egypt and almost the only relic of her former sway in Syria. In 1117 King Baldwin even invaded Egypt itself, burnt part of Farama, and reached Tinnis, when his fatal illness compelled him to return. The Egyptians attempted no reprisals, and henceforth, until the end of the Hâtimid dynasty, defensive diplomacy was the prevailing policy of their vezirs.

The wise rule of Afdal came to an end when his sovereign, growing to manhood, chafed in leading strings, and had the great vezir assassinated in the street at the close of 1121. The caliph visited the dying man and exhibited the deepest sympathy ; and, as soon as his eyes were closed, spent forty days in plundering his house of the treasures which he had amassed during his long administration. The historian G'âmal-ed-din, who was acquainted with one of Afdal's officers, declares that the vezir's wealth comprised 6,000,000 D in gold, 2,000 sacks (c. bushels each) of Egyptian silver dirhems, 7,000 atlas (satin) dresses, 30 camel-loads of gold caskets from 'Irâq, etc., together with an amber frame or lay figure on which to display the state robes. The making of his vast herds was farmed out during his last year for 30,000 D. Among his institutions was that of a sort of order of chivalry, called the "squires of the chamber," a body of youths furnished each with a horse and arms, and pledged to execute without faltering any command he gave them. Those who distinguished themselves were promoted to the rank of emir. His successor, Ibn-el-Batāḥī, styled el-Marmūn, though a capable financier and a tolerant minister, could not keep his place : he was imprisoned in 1125 and afterwards crucified.<sup>1</sup> The caliph now tried the experiment of being his own vezir, aided only by the monk Abū-Nejāḥ b. Kenna, who farmed the taxes of the Christians for 100 000 D. The monk became general collector of revenue, but gave himself such a ra's that the caliph had him flogged to death with thongs.

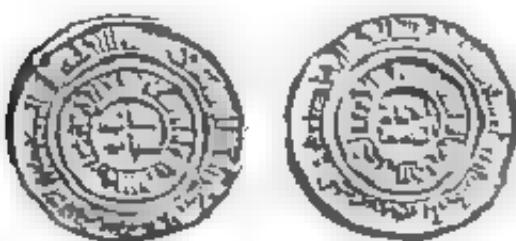

FIG. 36.—Dirār of el-Amir Kūt,
1123 or 1125

El-Amir's sole rule made him universally detested. Oppression of every kind and wanton executions showed the innate cruelty of his nature, and in November, 1130, as he rode back from the Hawdāg—a delightful pleasure-house on the is and of Rödla, which he had built for his favourite Bedawi mistress, and which rivalled his charming rosaries at Kalyūb—the caliph was set upon by ten of the Ismā'īlian Assassins, and died of his wounds the same night. Apart from his taste in roses, the most notable fact about his private life is that 5000 sheep, at 3 D. a head, were consumed in his kitchen every month.

El-Amir left no son, and his cousin el-Hāfiẓ<sup>2</sup> succeeded him (1131-1149), at first as regent, pending the delivery of one of the late caliph's wives who was with child.

<sup>1</sup> He built the Grey Mosque (Gāmi' a-Akmar) in 1121-2, of which the ruins are still to be seen in the Beyn-el-Kmarey.

<sup>2</sup> Abū-l-Meyrān 'Abdu'l-Maqid el-Hāfiẓ li-dini llāh. "the guardian of the religion of God," struck coins only at Mysr (Fusṭāt) and Alexandria, with dates from 1131 to 1148-9.

Unluckily for her, she bore a daughter, but before the regent became actual caliph a curious interregnum occurred. Abū-'Ali, nicknamed Katīṣat, who had been made wezīr by the overwhelming voice of the army, was a staunch Imāmīan or Twelve-Imām's-man, a believer in the return of the Mahdi, and a complete sceptic as to the Fūṭūmid claim to the caliphate. He shut up the regent in the palace, and had the prayers recited and the coinage struck in the name of no living ruler but of the predicted Mahdi, or Imām el-Muntazar ("the expected").<sup>1</sup> This farce went on for a year, during which Katīṣat exercised plenary powers. He was not a bad ruler, nevertheless — the tradition of good government was strong in his family — he was just and benevolent, tolerant and generous to the Copts, and a great lover of poetry. His autocracy could not last long, however, with the rightful caliph intriguing against him in the palace ; and in December, 1131, whilst riding out to play polo, he was assassinated by some of the caliph's personal corps or "young guard."

El-Hāfiẓ now entered upon his real caliphate, at the age

<sup>1</sup> Coins bearing the name of "the Imām Muḥammad Abū-l-Kāsim el-Muntazar-li-amr-llāh, commander of the faithful," were struck at el-Mu'izzīya el-Kāhira ("the victorious city of Mu'izz, i.e. Cairo), Mīr (i.e. Fustat), and Alexandria, in A.H. 525 (1131 A.D.), and another, struck at Mīr in 526 (Nov.-Dec., 1131), for the wezīr was assassinated on Dec. 8), bears not only the title of "the Imām el-Mahdi el-Kāsim-li-amri-llāh Hugget-Allah-'alā-l-'Ajamia," which denote the same predicted personage as el-Muntazar, but also presents the name of "el-Afdal Abū-'Ali Ahmad" as "his lieutenant (naib) and khalifa," titles which indicate an advance in the wezīr's pretensions. See Makriti, Khitat, i. 406; Lane-Poole, Cat. of Or. Coins in the British Museum, vol. iv., pp. ix-xiii., 55-6. Sauvage and Lane-Poole, The Twelfth Imam on the Coinage of Egypt, J.R.A.S., v. 140-151.

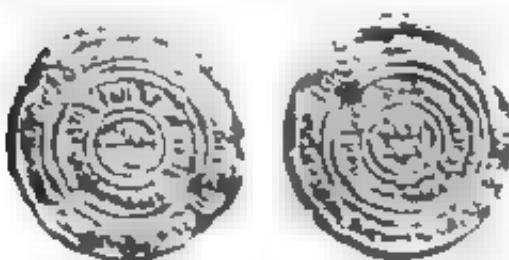

Fig. 37 — Dinar of "the expected Imām," Cairo, 1131.

age of 27, with Yanis, an Armenian slave of Afifal, as vezir. Yanis was a strict disciplinarian a hard upright, intelligent, and detested man. In nine months he was found too overbearing, and the caliph had him poisoned by the court doctor. After this, perhaps in order to avoid arousing jealousy among the troops, or to escape the tyranny of a too powerful minister, Hafiz tried for a time to do without any vezir, and proved himself no mean administrator, till the quarrels of his sons over the appointment to the hetanship brought about civil war between the rival battalions of the Rukhailya and the Guvishiya black soldiery, to whom the caliph was forced to sacrifice his elder son. The victorious Guvishiya ministered to the number of 10,000 in the Beyne-Kastan fort, and decapitated the head of prince Hassan, who had caused the deaths of many emirs. The helpless caliph summoned his two court doctors : Abū-Mansūr the Jew refused to do the job, but his Christian colleague, Ibn-Kirfa mixed a deadly draught which Hasan was forced to drink. Ibn Kirfa was a man of considerable attainments in science, apart from his practical acquaintance with toxicology ; he held several lucrative court appointments, such as master of the wardrobe, and possessed a charming house on the canal ; but the caliph could not endure him after he had poisoned his son, and the too subservient doctor was cast into prison and executed soon after his victim.

The remaining years of Fātimid rule in Egypt were marred by the continual contests of rival ministers, supported by factions in the army. The troops set up as vezir Bahram, an Armenian Christian, who was nevertheless styled "the Sword of Isām" but his wholesale appointment of his fellow countrymen to all the offices and departments of state, and the consequent indulgence of Christians, led to his expulsion, together with 2000 of his Armenian protégés,<sup>1</sup> and his eventual adoption of the monastic life.<sup>1</sup> His successor, Rudwan,<sup>1137</sup> a gallant soldier and a poet, was the first to assume the title of king (melik), afterwards used by all Fatimid wezirs; he was styled el-Melik el-Afif and Seyyid el-Aqall ("the most excellent king and most illustrious noble"), but his titles did not save him from a fall: he was thrown into prison, and though after ten years he contrived to bore his way through the prison wall with the proverbial iron nail, and assembling many followers established himself in the Grey Mosque (el-Akmar) in front of the great palace of the caliph, he was cut down and his head was thrown into his wife's lap. A horrible story is told that his body was cut into small pieces and devoured by belding warriors, in the belief that they would thus assimilate his pith and courage.

<sup>1</sup> The number may be exaggerated, but it should be noted that Bedr al-Zamān brought an Armenian bodyguard with him to Cairo, and that for more than half a century the government had been in Armenian

The last year of the old caliph's reign—if reign it could be called when his authority hardly extended beyond the palace and was only maintained there by his drunken negro guard—was passed in a scene of constant faction and tumult; the streets were unsafe and the people lived in a perpetual terror. The caliph was now 71 years of age, and suffered grievously from indigestion. His physician invented a drum, cunningly composed of the seven metals, welded at the exact moment when the sounding of each of the seven planets promised fortunate results; and whenever this magic drum was beaten, the caliph's flatulence was relieved. This interesting machine was in the palace at the time of Saladin's conquest, and one of his Kurdish soldiers carelessly thrummed it, in ignorance of its peculiar properties. The effect was so astonishing that the man dropped the drum in confusion, and it was broken.

There is no doubt that under the Fatimids, on the whole, the Christians of Egypt were treated with unusual consideration, far more than under succeeding dynasties. Setting aside the persecutions of Hakim, which were merely part of a general tyranny, the Copts and Greeks, no doubt to the great increase and aggrandisement of the Armenian colony.

<sup>1</sup> Abu-Salih, f. 84a.

Armenians had never before received so much benevolence from Muslim rulers. Under 'Aziz they were favoured beyond the Mohammadans and were appointed to the highest offices of state. Under Mustanṣir and his successors, Armenians (whether Christians or not) protected their fellow-countrymen and through them the other Christians during the long period when the wazirat was in their hands. Most of the financial posts of government were then, as always, in the possession of Copts. They were the farmers (ilāmin) of taxes, and the controllers of accounts, and their ability made them indispensable. Throughout the reigns of the later caliphs we read constantly of the building and restoration of churches, recorded by the Christian Abū-Salih, whose contemporary history accurately reflects the state of Egypt at the close of the Fatimid rule. The caliph Iqṭī even welcomed the Armenian patriarch at his usual public levees on Mondays and Thursdays every week, to receive his instruction in history, and continued the practice up to his death. Hāfiẓ was fond of visiting monasteries, where a manṣara or belvedere was sometimes erected looking on the secluded gardens and commanding a view of "the blessed Nile," and he and his son Zahr, and the last caliph 'Alīd, used for this reason to frequent the monastery of Our Lady at el-'Adawiya, eighteen miles south of Cairo, and contributed to its support in return for the monks' hospitality. The caliph Amīr a great lover of gardens, delighted in the monastery of Nahwā, west of Giza, where he built a belvedere, and whenever he used to go out hunting. Every time he went he gave the monks a thousand dirhems. He amused himself by standing in the priest's place in the church, but he refused to bow in order to enter the low door, and compromised matters by stooping and going in backwards.<sup>1</sup> The revenue of the Egyptian churches, largely derived from Fatimid gifts, amounted in 1180 to £11,700 and 4820 sacks (of 5 bushels) of corn, and they owned 315 acres of land.

<sup>1</sup> Ayyub b. R. 29, 70, 404, 63-2, &c.

On the death of Hāfiẓ in October 1149, his youngest son ez-Zāhir<sup>1</sup> was set on the throne. He was a gay, handsome, careless youth of 16, who thought more of girls and songs than of arms and politics, and was wholly managed by the shrewd vezir Ibn-es-Salar, a Kurd and an orthodox Sunnī, who was styled el-Melik el-Adil. He had driven out the caliph's nominee, Ibn-Masīl, and was consequently hated by ez-Zāhir (whose "young guard" he suppressed and well-nigh exterminated in 1150), and as heartily detested by the people, whose lives were never safe from his executioners. His assassination by his wife's grandson, Naṣr, followed by the murder of the caliph by the same treacherous hands, belongs to one of the darkest chapters of Egyptian history. We have the story from the pen of a contemporary, the Arab chief Osama, who used to hawk cranes and herons with Hāfiẓ's court, was the guest of Ibn-es-Salar, and the intimate, if not instigator, of his murderer.<sup>2</sup> The vezir's skull was placed in the Museum of Heads in the finance department by the overjoyed caliph, who gave the handsome young assassin twenty silver plates covered each with 20,000 D., and encouraged him to follow up his first essay in the fine art. The suggestion was that he should make away with his own father and fellow-conspirator 'Abbas, who had succeeded to the vezirate of his murdered stepfather, Ibn-es-Salar. Naṣr was not indisposed to the second crime, and 'Abbas, scenting danger, prepared to poison his son. The strained situation was relieved by the murder of the trusting caliph at a friendly entertainment in the young villain's own house. The next day Osama was sitting in the palace porch, when he suddenly heard the clash of

Fig. 38.
Glass weight of ez-Zāhir

(whose "young guard" he suppressed and well-nigh exterminated in 1150), and as heartily detested by the people, whose lives were never safe from his executioners. His assassination by his wife's grandson, Naṣr, followed by the murder of the caliph by the same treacherous hands, belongs to one of the darkest chapters of Egyptian history. We have the story from the pen of a contemporary, the Arab chief Osama, who used to hawk cranes and herons with Hāfiẓ's court, was the guest of Ibn-es-Salar, and the intimate, if not instigator, of his murderer.<sup>2</sup> The vezir's skull was placed in the Museum of Heads in the finance department by the overjoyed caliph, who gave the handsome young assassin twenty silver plates covered each with 20,000 D., and encouraged him to follow up his first essay in the fine art. The suggestion was that he should make away with his own father and fellow-conspirator 'Abbas, who had succeeded to the vezirate of his murdered stepfather, Ibn-es-Salar. Naṣr was not indisposed to the second crime, and 'Abbas, scenting danger, prepared to poison his son. The strained situation was relieved by the murder of the trusting caliph at a friendly entertainment in the young villain's own house. The next day Osama was sitting in the palace porch, when he suddenly heard the clash of swords. It was his friend 'Abbās with his thousand swordsmen, who had gone to the palace ostensibly to inquire for the vanished caliph, and was now massacring the caliph's brothers, whom he had the assurance to tax with the mysterious crime. The baby heir was displayed to the weeping court mounted on the vizir's shoulder, and the soldiers shouted their mercenary homage. So ghastly was the scene that one of the old janitors of the palace died of terror behind his door with the key in his hand. Cairo rose in revolt, there was fighting in the streets, and the very women and children of the harems threw stones from the windows upon the vizir's retainers, who immediately deserted him. 'Abbās could not withstand the storm of indignation and vengeance, and fled towards Syria.<sup>1</sup> On the way he was surprised and killed by the Franks probably those of Montréal or of Karak by the Dead Sea, who had been set on his track by one of the murdered caliph's sisters. The source of all this tragedy, the inhuman Nasr, was sold by the Templars to the avengers for 60,000 D., sent to Cairo in an iron cage, tortured by the women of the court, paraded through the city without nose or ears, crucified alive at the Bāb-Zawila, and left to hang there for many months.

<sup>1</sup> Abū-Manṣūr Ibrāhīm ez-Zāfir-ibn-'Adābi-l-Biṣrī-l-Bihī, "the conqueror of the enemies of God's religion," struck coins only at Mīr and Alexandria, dated from 1149-50 to 1153-4.

<sup>2</sup> See H. Derenbourg, Vie d'Osma, 205-263.

The poor little child of four years, who entered upon his caliphate amidst all these horrors, and nearly died of fright on the awful day of his accession, was proclaimed with the title of el-Fāiz (1154-1160).<sup>2</sup> During the tumult

<sup>1</sup> A graphic account of these events is given by the eye-witness Osāma, possibly the Isha of the tragedy (Derenbourg, Vie, 238-258).

<sup>2</sup> Abū 'l-Kāsim Isā el Fāiz-bi-nasri-lل, "the overcomer by God's help." His coins were from the mints of Miṣr and Alexandria, 1154-5 to 1160.

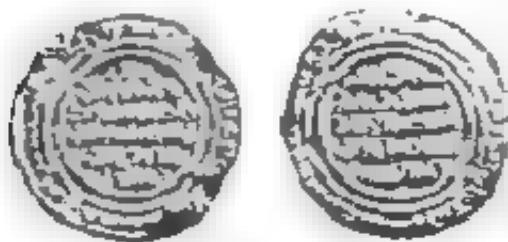

Fig. 39.
Dinar of al-Zahir, Miṣr, 1149.

that succeeded the murder of his kindred, the women of the palace had cut off their hair in mourning and sent it—the strongest possible sign of entreaty in a Muslim—to the emir Talai ibn-Ruzzik, the governor of Lishmuneyn, imploring him to come to the rescue. It was his advance, supported by the Arab tribes of the desert, and joined by the Sūdānī troops of the household, many emirs, and the general mob of Cairo, that had compelled the instant flight of 'Abbas. Waving the woman's treasures upon his lance, Ibn-Ruzzik entered Cairo and took possession of the Dār-el-Ma'mūn, the sumptuous palace of 'Abbas and before him of Ibn-el-Baqā'ī.<sup>1</sup> He went to the room of "the murderer Nasr, raised a flagstone pointed out in the pavement, and there found the body of the murdered Zahr, which he interred in the mausoleum of the caliphs amid universal lamentation. Then he set about restoring order, punishing the guilty, executing the truculent generals who had made havoc in Cairo for so many years, and establishing a reign of law.

Ibn-Mehk es-Salib, as he was now styled, was a strong man, and Egypt was sorely in need of strong men at that time. Ascalon, her last outpost in Palestine, had fallen away from her during the divisions and confusion that followed upon Ibn-es-Salār's assassination. It had long been a source of great solicitude, frequently attacked by the kings of Jerusalem, and doggedly defended by a large garrison, which was renewed twice a year from Egypt. The hurried return of one of these six-months' commanders, 'Abbas, to enjoy the fruits of his stepfather's assassination, left it comparatively unprotected; the Christians seized the occasion, and with the capture of Ascalon in the summer of 1153 vanished the last hold of the Franks on Palestine. That the Crusading rule had not been extended over Egypt itself was chiefly due to the growing power of the Turkish states on the east. The king of Jerusalem was too closely occupied, first with the savage onslaughts of Zengi, the Atābeg of Mōqil, who had joined Aleppo to his dominions on the Tigris and Euphrates, harried Syria and defeated the Crusaders with great slaughter at Athârib in 1130, and had finally taken Edessa, "the conquest of conquests," in 1144.<sup>1</sup> After the death of Zengî two years later, his son Nûr-ed-din succeeded to his post as champion of Islam in Syria, and greatly strengthened his position by the annexation in 1154 of Damascus, which had long been in defensive alliance with the Crusaders. The collapse of the second Crusade under the emperor Conrad and Louis VII had disheartened and discredited the Franks; and the establishment of so strong a power at Nûr-ed-din's kingdom at Aleppo and Damascus in the immediate port and east rendered the position of the Jerusalem kingdom extremely insecure. Had Egypt been strong, had Egypt been of the same orthodox creed, a combination with Damascus would doubtless have driven the Crusaders to the coast—as such a union did a little later. The Egyptian vizirs were fully alive to the value of Nûr-ed-din's support, and Ibn es-Sâlîr had opened negotiations with him through the mediation of Osâma, who was well-known at both courts. But the weak point of Nûr-ed-din was excessive caution, and his ambition was satisfied with the ample dominions he possessed, without venturing upon wider schemes. Moreover, whilst as a notably devout Muslim he was bound to wage the Holy War against the infidels, his very piety raised scruples against any alliance with the schismatic caliph of Egypt. Thus it fell out that whilst the fear of Nûr-ed-din restrained the Franks from invading Egypt,<sup>2</sup> the horror of heresy withheld the sultan of Damascus from co-operation with Egypt against the common enemy.

<sup>1</sup> It was converted by Saladin in 1177 into the Ḥanafī "College of the Swordsmakers" (Maqr. ii. 365-6).

Neither Damascus nor Jerusalem could afford to let Egypt fall into the hands of the other, and thus we find Cairo becoming the centre of diplomatic activity. The wezir Sâlih ibn-Ruzzik was eager for an alliance with Nûr-ed-Din, and his pourparlers, expressed in elegant Arabic verse addressed to his friend Osâma, who was now again at Damascus, enlarged on a victory won by the Egyptian army under Dirghâm near Gaza over the Franks in March, 1124, extolled the valour and numbers <sup>1124</sup> of the troops and ships of Egypt, and urged Nûr-ed-Din to bestir himself to similar efforts, sketching a glorious campaign of combined triumphs.<sup>1</sup> He got nothing but evasive replies, couched in vague poetic metaphor, from Osâma : Nûr-ed-Din evidently distrusted the Egyptian proposals. Ibn-Ruzzik even sent a formal embassy in October to Damascus, with handsome presents and a collection of the wezir's war-songs, offering 70,000 D. towards the Holy War, but wholly in vain.

<sup>1</sup> See an outline of Zengî's career in Lane-Poole, Life of Saladin, 35-61.

<sup>2</sup> The Sicilian fleet made a descent on Tripoli in 1153, and again in 1155, but after plundering the coast cities it attempted no serious occupation of the country.

Failing in his policy of combined action against the Crusaders, Ibn-Ruzzik was yet successful in maintaining order in Egypt itself. "He was eminent by his personal merit," says Ibn-Khalîkân, "profuse in largesse, accessible to suitors, a generous patron to men of talent, and a good poet." His verse was collected in two volumes, and he had a bad habit of reciting it to his friends, not without retaliation. Like other wezirs, he built a mosque, the ruins of which are still to be seen close to the Bâb-Zawila, though much of the decoration is attributed to a later restoration. He was not above avarice, however, and farmed the taxes to the highest bidders on six months' tenures to the great injury of the fellâbin. He might have long survived their discontent, but he ran a more serious risk in imposing a strict regimen upon the caliph's household. The little caliph Fâiz had died in July, 1160, at the age of eleven, after six years of virtual <sup>1160</sup> captivity and constant epileptic seizures. His successor, of el-'Aqâd.

Fig. 40. Glass weight

<sup>2</sup> See the poetical correspondence in the autobiography of Osâma, and Detenbourg Vie d'Osâma, 285-295.

el-Ādīd<sup>1</sup> (1160-1171), the last of the Fāṭimid caliphs, was only nine, and was chosen from the various possible heirs simply because his childhood made him easy to manage. But the wezir had to reckon with the women of the harem, who hated his rigorous control; and an aunt of the caliph succeeded in procuring the great man's assassination. As Ibn-Ruzzik lay dying, he begged the child to send the guilty woman to be punished, and had her executed before his eyes. His last words were a regret that he had not conquered Jerusalem and exterminated the Franks, and a warning to his son to beware of Shāwar, the Arab governor of Upper Egypt. The regret and the warning were well founded. Shāwar deposed and executed the wezir's son, el-'Adil Ruzzik, at the beginning of 1163, and within the year the Christian king of Jerusalem was in Egypt.

The interference of Amalric was the result of a fresh change in the wezirate. Shāwar was driven from Cairo by the popular favourite, Dirghām, a Lakhmi Arab, who had successfully commanded the troops against the Crusaders at Gaza, and held the post of colonel of the Barkiya battalion and "lord of the door"—an office second only to that of wezir. Shāwar fled to Nūr-ed-din and implored his help. He offered not only to pay the cost of an expedition, but promised a third of the revenues of Egypt in the form of an annual tribute.<sup>2</sup> The king of Syria was not indifferent to the importance of obtaining a hold upon Egypt: he knew that it was the master-key of the political situation and would form a prolific source of revenue. Yet he hesitated to accept Shāwar's overtures. Distrust of the man himself, and apprehension of the risks to which an expedition would be exposed when marching through the desert on the Crusaders' flank, made him pause. Events, however, moved too fast for his prudence. Dirghām quarrelled with Amalric over the yearly subsidy (which had apparently been paid off late by the vizirs of Egypt to the Franks to stave off a Christian invasion<sup>1</sup>), and the new king of Jerusalem with prompt decision invaded Egypt. Dirgham, after a severe defeat near Bilbeys, ingeniously avoided total discomfiture by breaking down the dams and causeways and flooding the country with the imprisoned waters of the Nile, then at its height Amalric had already retired to Palestine, but half satisfied with some sort of composition, when Dirgham, hearing of Shawar's negotiations at Damascus, perceived his error in not conciliating the Latin king, and hastened to proffer an eternal alliance, to be cemented by increased tribute. This step must have been known to Nur-ed-din. Fortified by an auspicious consultation of the Korân, he immediately cast his former scruples to the winds; and before Amalric could intervene, Shawar was on the march to Egypt, supported by a strong force of Turkomans from Damascus, led by Shirkuh, with his nephew Saladin on his staff.

<sup>1</sup> Abū-Muhammed 'Abdallāh el-'Ādīd-bi-dīn-llīlī, "the strengthener of the religion of God." His few coins were struck at Miṣr (1161 and 1164-5), Cairo (1160, 1167—1171), and Alexandria (1167-71).

<sup>2</sup> The following account of the conquest of Egypt by Nūr-ed-din's armies is slightly abridged from Lane-Poole, Life of Saladin, pp. 81-97.

The Egyptians were defeated at Bilbeys, but rallied again under the walls of Cairo. For several days indecisive conflicts took place, Shawar holding Fustat, and the other the castle of Cairo. Then, to raise funds, Dirgham possessed himself of the watf, the "money of the orphans," and at once the people began to fall away from him. Worse still, he was deserted by the caliph and the army. Driven to bay, for the last time he sounded the assembly. In vain "the drums beat and the trumpets blared, sia-she-lah! on the battlements": no man answered. In vain the desperate emir, surrounded by his bodyguard of 500 horse, all that remained to him of a powerful army, stood suppliant before the caliph's palace for a whole day, even until the sunset call to prayer, and implored him by the memory of his forefathers to stand forth at the window and bless his cause. No answer came : the guard itself gradually dispersed, till only thirty troopers were left. Suddenly a warning cry reached him : "Look to thyself and save thy life!"—and lo ! Shawar's trumpets and drums were heard, entering from the Gate of the Bridge. Then at last the deserted leader rode out through the Zawila gate : the hickle folk hacked off his head, and bore it in triumph through the streets; his body they left to be worried by the curs. Such was the tragic end of a brave and gallant gentleman, poet, and paladin.

<sup>1</sup> William of Tyre calls it annus tributi peregrinorum (Hist., xx. 3), and others give the amount as 33,000 D. The tribute or blackmail must have been very recently instituted, for Ibn Razik, who died in 1161, assuredly would have paid no such subsidy to the "infidels." Probably Shawar began the payment in 1162, but the fact cannot be proved.

May Shawar, restored to power, was eager to see the backs of the allies who had effected his reinstatement. He cautiously excluded Shirkūh from the fortified city of Cairo and kept him in the suburbs. Then safe, as he thought, within his own strong walls, he defied his ally, broke all his promises, and refused to pay the indemnity. Shirkūh was not the man to forego his rights or condone broken faith ; he sent Saladin to occupy Bilbeys and the eastern province. This hostile movement compelled Shawar in turn to appeal to Amalric. On the arrival of the Crusaders the Syrian army entrenched itself at Bilbeys, where it resisted all assaults for three months. A fortunate diversion at last came to its relief. Nūr-ed-din was waging a successful campaign in Palestine. After a reverse at the hands of Gilbert de Lacy and Robert Mauzel, he had taken Harenc and was laying siege to Caesarea Philippi ; and Amalric was sorely wanted at home to protect his own kingdom, always dangerously exposed upon its eastern marches. Nor was Shirkūh less anxious to extricate himself from a situation where, attacked all day and every day, penned in behind weak earthworks, and running short of food, his position was neither safe nor agreeable. An armistice was accordingly arranged, and the two parties came to terms. On the 27th of October, the Syrians marched out of their camp and filed off between the lines of the allied Crusaders and Egyptians, Shirkūh himself, battle-axe in hand, bringing up the rear.

The expedition to Egypt had ended without glory, but it had accomplished its object; it had spied out the land, and Shirkūh was able to report favourably on the possibility and advantages of annexation. Egypt was a country, he said, "without men, and with a precarious and contemptible government." Its wealth and defencelessness invited aggression. The ambitious general was devoured by desire for a viceregal throne at Cairo, and from this time forth he persistently urged Nūr-ed-din to authorize the conquest of Egypt. The bolder spirits at court supported his importunity, and the caliph of Baghdad accorded his blessing and encouragement to a project which involved the deposition of his heretical rival. Nūr-ed-din, ever cautious, resisted these influences for a while, but at last gave way,—possibly because rumours had reached him of a closer union between Shawar and the Franks, which soon proved to be well founded.

It was, in fact, a race for the Nile. Shirkūh started first, at the beginning of 1167, with 2000 picked horsemen, and, taking the desert route by the Gazelle Valley to avoid a collision with the Franks, but encountering on the way a violent and disastrous sandstorm, reached the Nile at Atfih, some forty miles south of Cairo, where he caught cross to the west bank without fear of molestation. He had hardly earned his army over, however, when Amalric appeared on the east side, having hurried from Palestine as soon as he heard of the enemy's movements. The two armies followed the opposite banks down to Cairo, where Amalric pitched his camp close to Fustat, whilst Shirkūh took up a position exactly facing him at Giza. There each waited for the other to begin operations. Meanwhile, Amalric took the opportunity of the vizir's amicable dispositions to place their alliance on a more formal basis. Convinced of the unstable character of the minister, he resolved to have a treaty ratified by the caliph in person. The conditions were that Egypt should pay the king 200,000 gold pieces then and there, and a further like sum at a later date, in return for his aid in expelling the enemy. On this agreement Amalric gave his hand to the caliph's representatives, and claimed a like ratification from the caliph himself.

The introduction of Christian ambassadors to the sacred presence, where few even of the most exalted Muslims were admitted, was unprecedented, but Amalric was in a position to dictate his own terms. Permission was granted, and Hugh of Cesarea with Geoffrey Fulcher the Templar were selected for the unique embassy. The vizir himself conducted them with every detail of oriental ceremony and display to the Great Palace of the Fatimids. They were led by mysterious corridors and through guarded doors, where stalwart Södhus saluted with naked swords. They reached a spacious court, open to the sky, and surrounded by arcades resting on marble pillars: the panelled ceilings were carved and inlaid in gold and colours; the pavement was rich mosaic. The unaccustomed eyes of the rude knights opened wide with wonder at the taste and refinement that met them at every step,—here they saw marble fountains, birds of many notes and wondrous plumage, strangers to the western world; there, in a further hall, more exquisite even than the first, "a variety of animals such as the ingenious hand of the painter might depict, or the license of the poet invent, or the mind of the sleeper conjure up in the visions of the night,—such, indeed, as the regions of the East and the South bring forth, but the West sees never, and scarcely hears of." At last, after many turns and windings, they reached the throne room, where the multitude of the pages and their sumptuous dress proclaimed the splendour of their lord. Thrice did the vizir, ungirding his sword, prostrate himself to the ground, as though in humble supplication to his god; then, with a sudden rapid sweep, the heavy curtains brodered with gold and pearls were drawn aside, and on a golden throne, robed in more than regal state, the caliph sat revealed.

The vizir humbly presented the foreign knights, and set forth in lowly words the urgent danger from without, and the great friendship of the king of Jerusalem. The caliph, a swarthy youth emerging from boyhood,—fusca, procerus corpore, fuscis testiculis,—replied with suave dignity. He was willing, he said, to confirm in the amplest way the engagements made with his beloved ally. But when asked to give his hand in pledge of faithfulness he hesitated, and a thrill of indignation at the stranger's presumption ran through the listening court. After a pause, however, the caliph offered his hand—gloved as it was—to Sir Hugh. The blunt knight spoke him straight : "My lord, troth has no covering, in the good faith of princes, all is naked and open." Then at last, very unwillingly, as though derogating from his dignity, the caliph, forcing a smile, drew off the glove and put his hand in Hugh's, swearing word by word to keep the covenant truly and in all good faith.<sup>1</sup>

The treaty thus ratified, Amalric attempted to throw a bridge of boats across the Nile ; but the presence of the enemy on the other side defeated the plan, and he resorted to another. Descending to where the river forked into its two main streams, he conveyed his army over to the delta by night, and thence to the other side, in ships. Shirkūh discovered the movement too late to oppose, and finding the enemy landed he retreated to Upper Egypt. The king pursuing came up with him at "the two Gates" (el-Bābān), ten miles south of Minya. Here was a plain, on the border where the cultivated land touched the desert, and numerous sandy hills gave cover to the combatants. Shirkūh's captains at first advised him not to risk a battle ; but one of them stood forth and said stoutly, "Those who fear death or slavery are not fit to serve kings : let them turn ploughmen, or stay at home with their wives." Saladin and others applauded ; and Shirkūh, always ready for hard knocks,<sup>2167</sup> gladly gave battle (18 April, 1167). He put the baggage in the centre, covered by Saladin's troop, which was to bear the first brunt of the attack. Saladin's orders were to fall back when pressed and draw the enemy in pursuit, and then to press them in turn, as the light might allow. Shirkuh himself took command of the right wing, composed of a body of picked horsemen, which was to cut up the enemy's rear, consisting of the less warlike Egyptians. It fell out as he expected. The Franks were drawn away by Saladin, the Egyptians were cut up and routed, and when the Crusaders, returning from the pursuit, found their allies fled, they also hastily retreated, abandoning their baggage and leaving Hugh of Caesarea among the prisoners.<sup>1</sup> The victors, however, were not strong enough to follow up the success, march on to Cairo, and run Shawar and Amalric to earth. Taking the lesser risk, Shirkuh went north by a desert route and entered Alexandria without opposition. Here he installed Saladin as governor, with one half of his army, while with the other he again turned southwards to levy contributions in Upper Egypt.

<sup>1</sup> William of Tyre, Historia rerum in partibus transmarinis gestarum, lib. xxii., cap. 19, 20. The embassy is not recorded by the Arabic chroniclers.

The joint forces of the Franks and Egypt was now invested Alexandria, whilst the Christian fleet held the coast. The defence of the city was Saladin's first independent command, and he quitted himself well. He had but a thousand followers of his own, in the midst of a mongrel and partly foreign populace, who, as malcontents, were not sorry to take part against a feeble government or to defend their city against the savage and bloodthirsty Franks, yet, as merchants and tradesmen, could not conceal their terror of the siege-machines and infernal engines which the "infidels" brought against their walls. Provisions, moreover, ran short; and short rations make a humble stomach. At last they rose in a tumult and openly talked of surrender. Saladin meanwhile had sent to his uncle for help, and Shirkuh was hurrying down from Kas taken with treasure. The news put fresh heart into the people, already spurred on by Saladin's spirited exhortations and the promise of reinforcement, or frightened into a desperate courage by his tales of the monstrous barbarities inflicted by the Franks upon the vanquished. They held out for seventy-five days, in spite of hunger and incessant assaults, till it became known that Shirkuh was at the Abyssinians' Lake, laying siege to Cairo. On this, Amalric gave up all thoughts of Alexandria, and a peace was arranged, by which both parties agreed to leave Egypt to the Egyptians. <sup>Aug. 4</sup> Alexandria was surrendered to Shāwar; prisoners were exchanged; and Shirkuh led the exhausted remnant of his 2000 troops back to Damascus.

<sup>1</sup> Ibn al Athir, Kamil, 548; according to his Adabiyat it was a month earlier. The numbers engaged are variously estimated. The Arab historians give Shirkuh only 2000 horsemen. William of Tyre (xx. 25), on the other hand, puts the Saracen force at 4000 men mailed (armis galutis), 4000 archers, and at least 10,000 Arabs armed with spears. The Latins, he says, had only 374 knights, an uncertain number of light infantry (Turcopoles), and a body of Egyptians who were more a burden than a help.

The Christians claimed the campaign as a triumph, and the evacuation of Alexandria as a surrender, but if the Arab chroniclers are right in saying that Amalric paid Shirkuh 50,000 pieces of gold to go away, the advantage would appear to have been on the side of the Muslims. On the other hand the Franks, in violation (apparently) of their agreement, not only left a Resident at Cairo, but insisted on furnishing the guards of the city gates from their own soldiers; they also increased the annual subsidy to be paid by Shāwar to the king of Jerusalem to 100,000 gold pieces. Not content with this hold, the more impetuous among Amalric's counsellors presently began to urge the complete conquest of Egypt, and their advice was strongly supported by the garrison they had left at Cairo and

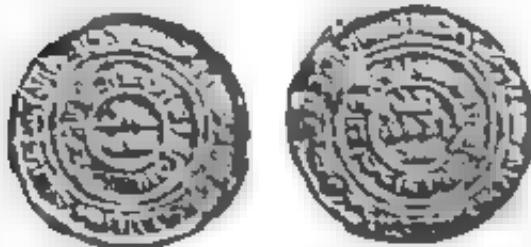

Fig. 41.—Dinar of el-'Ājjid, Cairo, 1168.

Fusṭīṭ, who had naturally the best means of discovering the weakness of their defences. The king of Jerusalem once more marched into Egypt ; but now he entered as an enemy where before he had been bidden as an ally. Arrived at Bilbeys on 3 November, 1168, he added to perfidy the crime of wholesale massacre,—he spared neither age nor sex, says the Latin chronicler, in the devoted town.

This barbarous act at once ranged the Egyptians on the side of Nür-ed-din, and inspired them to heroic exertions. They took advantage of the Christians' foolish loitering to marshal their forces and strengthen their defences. The old city of Fustat, for three hundred years the metropolis of Egypt and still a densely populated suburb of Cairo, was by Shawar's orders set on fire, <sup>1168</sup> that it might not give shelter to the Franks. Twenty thousand naphtha barrels and ten thousand torches were lighted.
<sup>1169</sup> The fire lasted fifty four days, and its traces may still be found in the wilderness of sandheaps stretching over miles of buried rubbish on the south side of Cairo.<sup>1</sup> The people fled "as from their very graves," the father abandoned his children, the brother his twin, and all rushed to Cairo for dear life. The hire of a camel for the mile or two of transit cost thirty pieces of gold. The capital itself was in a tumult of preparation for the attack. The assault, however, was postponed by the negotiations which Shawar adroitly contrived, to buy off his greedy assailants. There was more pretence than honesty in his diplomacy, for he was sending at the same moment couriers to Damascus to implore the aid of Nür-ed-din. The young caliph of Egypt wrote himself, and even enclosed some of his wives' hair as a supreme act of supplication which no gentleman could resist.

This time the king of Syria did not hesitate ; he was nettled at the poor results of the two previous expeditions, and indignant with the Franks for what he held to be a flagrant breach of faith. He might even have gone in person, but that he was preoccupied with the unsettled state of Mesopotamia. He lost no time, however, in despatching a force of 2000 picked troopers from his own guard, with 4000 paid Turkomans of approved valour, under the command of Shirkūh, supported by a large staff of emulous emirs. Nūr-ed-Dīn himself superintended the marshalling of the army at the Spring Head, a day's march from Damascus, and gave every man a gratuity of twenty gold pieces, whilst he committed to Shirkūh 200,000 D. for his military chest.

<sup>1</sup> The population reoccupied the burnt city to some extent for a century, and its final abandonment and demolition dates from the reign of Beybars (Kalkashandi, 58).

On 17 Dec., 1168, the third expedition began its march to Egypt, once more to rescue Shawar, in name, but in fact with far larger designs. Amāric, always needy and greedy, was still waiting before Cairo for more of the wazīr's promised gold, when Shirkūh suddenly effected his junction with the Egyptians (8 Jan., 1169), evading the Frank army which had gone out to intercept his advance. Deceived by Shawar and outgeneralled by Shirkūh, the discomfited king retired to Palestine without offering battle, having gained, as the proverb has it, nothing better than the "boots of Houeyn." The Syrians entered Cairo in triumph, and were welcomed as deliverers. The grateful caliph gave audience to Shirkūh and invested him with a robe of honour, clothed in which he returned to display himself to the army. Shawar, inwardly devoured by jealousy and alarm, rode out daily to the Syrian camp, in great state, with all his banners, drums, and trumpets, and overwhelmed the general with protestations of devotion; but meanwhile he took no steps to perform his engagements to Nūr-ed-dīn, but was actually meditating a treacherous arrest of Shirkūh and his officers at a friendly banquet. The Syrian leaders soon determined that he was not to be trusted, and Saladin and G'urdik resolved to get rid of him. As the wazīr was riding out to visit the general, who chanced to be paying his respects to the venerated tomb of the Imam ab-Shāfi'i, Saladin and his men dragged him from his horse and made him prisoner. Whatever doubts Shirkūh may have entertained as to the fate of Shawar were set at rest by a peremptory order from the caliph himself, who demanded the head of the wezir. Thus ended the brief and checkered career of a remarkable and politic minister, an Arab chief, moreover, of ancient lineage, with all the Bedawi's daring and the ancestral love of poetry—inasmuch that he once filled 'Omāra's mouth with gold in delight at an ode—and, it must be added, with the Arab's full share of falsehood and deceit.

The caliph al-'Ādīd, who was much impressed by the gallant bearing of his deliverers, immediately appointed Shirkūh to the vacant office, clad him in the robes of wezir, invested him with plenary powers, and gave him the titles of el-Melik en-Nāṣir, "Victorious King," and Commander-in-chief. The people were as pleased as the pontiff; they had liked the jolly soldier as he rode over the country a year and a half ago, even though he was levying taxes, and the Cairenes appreciated the liberal manner in which he had disbursed from his heavy military chest, and had refreshed them with the looting of Shīwar's palace, where they left not so much as a cushion for his lavish successor to sit on. The Arab poet saw more clearly when he remarked that the claws of "the Lion"<sup>1</sup> were now fastened on his prey. The "Lion of the Faith," however, lived scarcely more than two months to enjoy his quarry, but died suddenly, Mar. 23 March, 1169. He was succeeded by his nephew, the famous Saladin, and two years later, the Fatimid Caliphate was abolished.

It is remarkable that, although several of the Fatimid caliphs were men of intellectual culture and highly appreciative of literary talent, the period of their rule was unproductive in writers of exceptional merit. It was not for lack of patronage, for the wezirs of Egypt, as well as some of the caliphs, were often generous in their gifts to scholars, poets, and divines. The wezir Ibn-Kilis used to hold meetings every Thursday night, when he would read his compositions to the assembled savans, rhetoricians, grammarians, and divines, and poets would recite their verses, usually panegyrics of their host. He employed a regular staff in transcribing manuscripts, and every day a large table was laid for the learned men who joined his household and other guests. The caliph's physician, et-Tamimi of Jerusalem, was a man of real science, and his librarian, esh-Shibusi, wrote a history of the monasteries. Abū-r-Rakāmāk of Antioch (†1008-9), whom Tarlabi described as 'the pearl of his age, the amalgam of excellences, master of poetry in its light as in its various moods,' was among the panegyrists who attended the levees of Ibn-Kalbi, and wrote odes in praise of him and of the caliphs Mu'izz, 'Aziz, and Hakim. El-Kindi, the historian and topographer of Egypt (†1001), lived at Fustat, and his court notator, Ibn-Zūlik (†1007), an Egyptian, also wrote a history of the Kādis. But the most famous men of the early Fatimid time were the Kādi en-No'rīn and his sons and grandsons, who held the highest legal and religious offices for forty years, from the conquest of Egypt to the middle of the reign of Hakim, who accorded them special privileges. These Kādis, like most of their order, were not merely learned in the law and able judges, but men of the highest education of the age, familiar with all branches of Arabic literature, and themselves historians and poets. Another celebrated civil servant (though he wore a uniform) of the time of Hakim was el-Musebbīhi (†1030), an Egyptian by birth, who wrote the history of his country in 26,000 pages, and other works on religion, poetry, astrology, curiosities of literature and history, and the arts of the table, to the extent of 35,000 pages more. The wealth of the Fatimid court and the encouragement given to the polite sciences drew many foreigners to Cairo. El-Kudāsi, the historian and jurisconsult (†1062), Ibn-Bābhādh, the grammarian (†1077), and Abū-Ya'kūb en-Nagirāni (†1126) of Basra, a distinguished philologer, were amongst these visitors; and the Arabic manuscripts on philology, poetry, and the "Days" of the Arabs, copied by the last's accurate pen at an extremely moderate price, or delivered orally at his precise dictation, long remained the received texts in Egypt. The poet Ibn-el-Khalil (†1151), described by his contemporary, 'Imād-ed-din (Saladin's secretary), as "the pupil of Egypt's eye, combining all the noble qualities of his country," at the time of Hafiz, was president of the correspondence department, where the art of writing despatches in the most elaborate style was studiously cultivated. When a candidate for admission was asked what qualifications he possessed for the art of correspondence, he replied, "None, except that I know the Korān and the Hammāsa by heart." "That will do," said Ibn-el-Khalil. It was as though an Englishman should say that he could repeat the whole of the Bible and the "Golden Treasury." The wazir Ibn-es-Sāliḥ was a devout Sufiite Muslim as well as a tyrannical governor, and the college he founded at Alexandria to propagate the teaching of the theological school initiated by the Imam Shāfi'i had an excellent president in the eminent traditionist and divine es-Silāfi of Isfahan (†1180), among whose pupils was Ibn-el-Gārrāh (†1210), the poet, calligrapher, and ornament of the correspondence office. He elaborated a riddle which takes three large quarto pages to unravel. The Kādi er-Rashid ibn-es-Zabir (†1162), poet and accomplished man of letters, was another of Ibn-es-Sāliḥ's friends.

<sup>1</sup> A'ud-ed-din, "Lion of the Faith," was the Arabic surname of Shirkūh, which is itself Persian for "Mountain-Lion."

That there was not a larger number of distinguished scholars during the two centuries of Fatimid rule in Egypt is partly due to the insecurity of life—the court poet, 'Abd el-Ghaffar for example, was wantonly beheaded by Hākim, as were some of the celebrated Nōrīmān Kadīs—but much more to the heretical character of the dynasty. Orthodox Muslims shunned the court of caliphs whose doctrines and claims they utterly repudiated. A great deal of intellectual activity, however, was shown by the rank and file of students in Cairo during this period, and although the University of the Azhar had not yet attained the celebrity which it acquired under the orthodox rule of the succeeding dynasties, there was already the nucleus of a great theological school. The era of Egyptian colleges begins with the reign of Saladin.

In art, as has been shown, the immense wealth of the Fatimids tended to encourage the production of costly and beautiful objects of luxury, and the caliphs and their wezirs were notable builders. The great mosques of el-Azhar (though restored out of all semblance to the original design) and Hikim are still standing to testify to their zeal, and the remains of the smaller mosques or chapels of el-Aqmar and of es-Sahlī ibn-Ruzzik display the bold and effective designs and austere Kūfic inscriptions for which Fatimid art is renowned. The three massive gates of Cairo, built by Roman architects and resembling in plan and in details the heavy gates of Byzantine fortresses, are among the most enduring relics of the Shi'a government in Egypt, and it is worth noticing that the heretical formula of faith inscribed in beautiful Kūfic characters over the Gate of Victory in the reign of Mustanṣir has triumphantly survived eight centuries of dominant orthodoxy.

CHAPTER VII

SALADIN

1169—1193

Authorities.—Iahā-ed-dīn, Ibn-el-Athīr, Ḥimād-ed-dīn, Abū Ṣāḥib, Abu-Shāmā, Ibn-Khallikān, el-Maqrīzī; William of Tyre, Ernoul, Historia Regis Iherosolimitani; Lane-Poole's Life of Saladin (1893).

Monuments.—Citadel of Cairo and third wall of city.

Inscriptions.—Irrigation decree at Damascus, A.H. 574; restoration tablet in great mosque of Damascus, 575 (these two have disappeared, but are recorded by Waddington and van Berchem); citadel of Cairo 579 (Casanova, Alim Miss Arch., vi. 569); mosque of el-Aksā, Jerusalem (de Vogüé, Tenue de Jér., 101); Dome of the Rock, Jerusalem, 585 (de Vogüé, 91); Kubbat Yūsuf, Jerusalem; Church of St Anne, Jerusalem, 588 (de Vogüé, Églises de la Terre Sainte, 244, van Berchem, Inscr. Ar. de Syrie, Mem. de l'Inst. Egypt., 1897, Pl. v. fig. 10), tomb of Saladin, Damascus (inscr. disappeared, but recorded by Ibn-Khallikān, iv. 547).

Coinage.—Minted at Cairo, Mqṣ, Alexandria, Damascus, Ijazāh, Aleppo.

Glass weights.—Bearing name of 'Abbāsid caliphs el-Mustāfi and en-Nāṣir, without Saladin's name or date (Lane-Poole, Cat. Arab. Glass Weights in B.M., 36-8).

The epoch of Saladin's rule, though brief, was the most glorious in the history of Muslim domination in Egypt; but it owed its glory to causes outside. Of his reign of twenty-four years, Saladin<sup>1</sup> passed only eight at Cairo; the other sixteen were spent in campaigns in Syria, Mesopotamia, and Palestine. These external wars can only be briefly described here, and the chief place must be given to the affairs of Egypt proper.<sup>1</sup> Saladin was born at Tekrit in 1137-8, the son of Ayub, a Kurdish officer in the employment of the R̄ihdād caliph and afterwards of the Atūbeg Zangi of Mōsul. His youth was entirely undistinguished; and when his father became governor of Damascus, Saladin lived ten years at the court of Nūr ed din without making any mark. He took no part, apparently in the Syrian campaigns of his uncle Shirkūh, who was Nūr-ed-din's chief general; he loved retirement, and up to the age of twenty-five remained a completely obscure individual. He did indeed accompany the expeditions to Egypt in 1164 and 1167, and distinguished himself at the battle of Rābiān and the defence of Alexandria, but it was with great reluctance that he joined the third expedition in 1169, which proved to be his stepping-stone to empire. His succession to the office of wazīr of the Fātimid caliph on his uncle's death in March, 1169, was due, no doubt, partly to his kinship, but chiefly, as it seems, to the belief of the Egyptian court that so young and apparently unambitious a man would be easy to manage. His own comrades resented the appointment, and though the majority were won over by tact and presents, a certain number of jealous veterans retired to Syria.

<sup>1</sup> Saladin is the European softened form of Salāḥ-ed-dīn, "Honour of the Faith." His full names and titles were El-Melik en-Nāṣir Abū-l-Muzaffar Salāḥ-ed-dunyā wa-d-dīn Yūsuf ibn Ayyūb.

The young wazīr's position was curiously anomalous. He was at once the prime-minister of an heretical (Shī'a) caliph and the lieutenant of an orthodox (Sunni) king. With superb inconsistency the two names were included in the same prayer every Friday in the mosque. The Muslim population belonged to both creeds, but it may be assumed that two centuries of Fātimid rule had given some predominance to the Shī'a doctrine. To win the loyalty of the people was Saladin's first object, in order to strengthen himself against the obvious jealousy of his sovereign, the king of Syria, and pave the way for the abolition of the Shī'a caliphate and the foundation of an independent monarchy in Egypt.

<sup>1</sup> This necessary limitation may be compensated by reference to the recently published Life of Saladin by the present writer, from which the following pages are partly abridged.

Saladin's generosity and personal charm soon gained him the confidence of the Egyptians, and the substitution of his own father and brothers,—a conspicuously able and gallant family,—in the place of suspected officers of the court, strengthened his position. A rising of the caliph's black troops was repressed after some hard fighting in the streets, and the Sudānis were banished to the Ḫrid, where rebellion smouldered for several years. Hardly was the negro revolt checked when Damietta was attacked by the combined fleets of the Eastern emperor and the king of Jerusalem, numbering 220 galleys. Saladin had just time to reinforce the garrison, which proved equal to repulsing even the powerful mangonels and movable siege-towers of the enemy, whilst the army of Cairo harassed them outside. Famine and storm came to the aid of the Muslims, and the half-drowned starving invaders made peace and returned in great dejection to Palestine. This was the turning-point in the Franco-Egyptian struggle. Henceforth, instead of going forth to attack, the kingdom of Jerusalem was forced to stand upon its defence.

Saladin followed up this success by a raid into Palestine, in which he plundered the town of Gaza, and in the same year took Eyla, at the head of the gulf of Akaba, Fig. 42.—Glass weight of caliph al-Mustadji, issued by Saladin, 1171.

the key of the Red Sea route for pilgrims to Mekka. To carry out this operation he resorted to a device which was repeated by his adversaries afterwards; he built ships in sections at Cairo, and carried the parts overland to the Red Sea, where they were put together. The result of these successes against the "infidels" was such a measure of popularity in Egypt that Saladin felt himself strong enough to take a decisive step. As a strictly orthodox Muslim, he had chafed under his forced recognition of an heretical caliph, and he had only submitted to the situation because he did not feel sure of popular support. To educate public opinion he had founded three orthodox colleges in 1170; and now, with the added reputation of the "holy war" successfully waged in Palestine, he caused the name of the 'Abbasid caliph to be proclaimed instead of the Fatimid in the mosques on Friday, 10 Sept., 1171. This ecclesiastical revolution passed off without a murmur. The assembled congregation looked merely surprised. The last of the Fatimids happily, never learnt the secret of his deposition. He had been a recluse in his palace since the arrival of Saladin, and when his name was suppressed he lay dying. The news was mercifully withheld from him; and the last of the famous dynasty, which had been given such great opportunities and had misused them so contemptibly, died three days later, ignorant of his fall.<sup>1</sup> His family and kindred were maintained in gilded captivity, and his 18,000 slaves and servants distributed. Of all the treasures that he found in the palaces, Saladin kept nothing for himself. He gave some to his followers, some he presented to his sovereign Nār-ed-din, the library of 120,000 manuscripts he gave to his learned chancellor, the Kāfi al-Faḍl; the rest was sold for the public purse. Nor did it suit his simple and austere mode of life to take up his residence in the stately halls of the late caliph. He remained in the "House of the West," and gave up the palaces to the officers of the army. No longer a royal residence, the beautiful mansions of the Fatimids fell into decay, and not a vestige of them has been preserved. "O censorer of my love for the sons of Fatima," cried Omara the poet,

<sup>1</sup> The caliph el-'Ādī left eleven sons, four sisters, four wives, and other relations to the number of 152, whom the mayordomo Karibūsh shut up in different buildings of the palace, separating the sexes, but indulging them with every luxury except posterity. Nevertheless they continued to rear grandsons of the caliph, and the family was not extinct in 1260. A curious magic cup from Cairo, dated 371 (1175-6) bears the name of "the Imām al-Mā'āṣir m-bi l-lāh Abū-l-'Abbās Zāhir, the moon being in Cancer," and this may refer to one of the sons of el-'Ādī, whose claim was perhaps supported by the pro-Fatimid party, who continued for some years to conspire in the hope of restoring the fallen dynasty or of profiting by its nominal restoration. See Campana, Les derniers Fatimides, in Mém. de la Miss. Arch., vi. 415-445.

"join in my tears over the desolate halls of the twin palaces!"

Saladin's career, from his accession to power, falls into three distinct periods, which may be called the Egyptian, Syrian, and Palestinian in regard to the chief scene of action, or the Defensive, Consolidating, and Aggressive, in reference to policy. From the day he became ruler of Egypt he had vowed himself solemnly to the Holy War, the war of extermination against the Franks. Henceforward his whole policy was directed to that one great end. During the first or Egyptian period (1169—1174) he was on the defensive, not only against the Crusaders, but against the friends of the Fatimids, and even against his liege lord the king of Syria. The policy of this period was to resist internal and foreign attack, avoid a collision with Nur-ed-din, and strengthen himself in Cairo by every possible means, political and military. The second or Syrian period (1174—1186), beginning with the death of Nur-ed-din, saw Saladin, as now the leading Muslim ruler of the near East, extending his sway over Syria and Mesopotamia, and consolidating all the available forces of Islam for the final struggle with the "infidels." The third or Palestinian period (1186—1193) was wholly devoted to the Holy War against the Crusaders, and ended with the peace of Ramla, followed in a few months by the death of the champion of Islam. Through all three periods the one aim was steadily kept in view, and every act of policy, every campaign, was strictly directed to the main object—the creation of a united Saracen empire, strong enough to drive the Franks to the seaboard, if not into the sea. Whatever personal ambition may have mingled unconsciously with it, aggrandizement in Saladin's case meant primarily, if not solely, the triumph of Islam over the "infidels."

The first or Egyptian period had begun well. The Crusaders had not ventured to renew the attack by land, and the invasion by sea had been a fiasco. The mutiny of the black troops of Cairo—the greatest of all internal dangers—had ended in their expulsion to Upper Egypt. The Fatimid caliphate had been abolished with scarcely a sign of popular disapproval. The next step was to fortify himself alike against internal revolt and external invasion. The Fatimids had contented themselves with a fortified palace on the plain. Saladin, with a soldier's eye, had perceived the weakness of the position, and had already chosen a better site for his purpose. So far each successive dynasty in Egypt had enlarged the capital by extending it in the form of suburbs or vast palaces towards the north-east. Instead of carrying on this plan, Saladin "sought to unite the sites of all the four capitals, and to build a Citadel—the famous 'Castle of the Mountain'—on the westernmost spur of Mount Mukattam, to be the centre of government and to form a military stronghold capable of overawing the whole city and resisting assaults from outside. His plan was to connect this fortress by a bastioned wall with the old fortifications of the Fatimid 'city,' and to extend it so as to enclose the site of Fustat and Kafar-l. and thus to sweep round to the river; but the plan was not completed, and even the Citadel was not finished till long after his death. Saladin's enlargement of the area of the city was accompanied by the demolition of whole suburbs between the old 'city' and the shrine of Nefha. These were replaced by pleasure-gardens, and it is recorded that the tall Zawila gate could be seen from the door of Ibn-Tulun's mosque. Jehan Theraud, who accompanied an embassy from Louis XII to Cairo at a later period, found these gardens still a striking feature of the city: 'moult somptueux et grans jardins plains de tous fruitiers: comme cytrons, lymons, citrulles, oranges, aubercotz, cassiers et pommes de musez ou d'Adam pour ce que l'on dict estre le fruit duquel Adam eut trespassa le commandement de Dieu. Lesquelz jardins tous les soirs et matins sont arrosuez de l'eau du Nil que turent beufs et chevaux.' Traces of some of these pleasure-grounds may even now be seen from the battlements of the Citadel.

<sup>1</sup> Le voyage et itinéraire de autre mer fait par Frere Jehan Theraud, cited in Schefer's Nauviri Khawar, 133.

"It has been supposed that Saladin designed the Citadel of Cairo to protect himself against a possible insurrection of the partisans of the late dynasty. A sufficient explanation, however, is found in his early associations: every Syrian city had its citadel or fortress, and experience had shown many a time that the town might be taken whilst the citadel remained impregnable, a refuge for the people and a means of recuperation. Therefore Cairo must have a citadel too. It might soon be needed as a tower of defence against his suzerain Nur-ed-din himself. Saladin had propitiated the king of Syria with presents from the treasures of the Fihmid palace; prayers were offered for him as sovereign-lord every Friday in the mosques, above all in the great mosque of Hakim, which temporarily supplanted the Azhar as the chief mosque of the city; and his name appeared on the coins struck by Saladin at Cairo. But in spite of this nominal subjection and the absence of all symbols of personal sovereignty, Saladin was virtually his own master; and Azhar as the chief mosque of the city; and his name appeared on the coins struck by Saladin at Cairo. But in spite of this nominal subjection and the absence of all symbols of personal sovereignty, Saladin was virtually his own master; and supported as he was by a strong army commanded by his brothers and nephews, he was in fact king of Egypt. Nur-ed-din was well aware of this, but his difficulties with the Franks, with the Selguk Sultan of Rum, and with various contentious rulers in Mesopotamia, left him no leisure to clip the wings of his vassal in Egypt. He could not even count upon his co-operation in the Holy War; for Saladin was convinced that if once his suzerain had the chance of seizing his person, there would be an end of his power; and nothing could induce him to venture within Nur-ed-din's reach. Not only this, but he seems to have carried this dread so far that he preferred to have the Franks on his borders as an obstacle to Nûr ed-dîn's advance."<sup>1</sup>

Fig. 43.—Dinar of Nur-ed-din, issued by Saladin, Cairo, 1173.

This dread in some measure accounts for his desultory and half-hearted attacks upon Montâl and Karak, near the Dead Sea, in 1171 and 1173, and it is conjectured with much probability that his southern campaigns of 1173-4 were undertaken with a view to providing a place of retreat in case Nûr-ed-dîn carried out his threat of invading Egypt. A division of Saladin's army had already conquered the African littoral from Barka to Gabes in 1172-3; but this strip of coast offered no strategic position for defence. The expedition to the Sudan was prompted by the necessity for castigating ... the retreating but still rebellious blacks, but a rather probable object was to examine the resources of the country as a possible refuge. Saladin's elder brother, Tûmâshîh, after pursuing the blacks into Nubia, took the city of Ibrîm (the Roman Primis) near Korosku, pillaged the church of the monophysite Christians, tortured the bishop, and satisfied his Muslim prejudice by slaughtering 700 of the pigs that there abounded.<sup>2</sup> But his report on the climate and products of the Sudan was discouraging, and Saladin sent him to Arabia to seek a better country. Tûmâshîh reduced the whole of the Yemen (Arabia Felix), with its cities of San'a, 'Aden, Zebid, and G'end, and established his government ... at Ta'izz, whence the Yemen was ruled by members of Saladin's family for fifty-five years.

The absence of a gallant general and a considerable army in the Yemen furnished an opportunity to the partisans of the Fâtimids who still hoped to eject the young "mamûk," as they called Saladin, from his seat, and to re-establish the old order which promised better profits to the hangers-on of a luxurious court. The plot was generally ascribed to the Arab poet 'Omar, but whoever was the original instigator, it found wide support. Egyptian and Sudanese officers, abetted even by some of Saladin's jealous Turkmâns, joined in the conspiracy : the kings of Sicily and Jerusalem were induced to co-operate by promises of gold and territory ; the master of the Assassins was invited to send some of his secret murderers ; and preparations were made for a combined attack by sea and land, in which Saladin was to be enmeshed. Fortunately the intended victim got wind of the secret, seized the leading conspirators, including the poet-politician, and crucified them all.

<sup>1</sup> Lane-Poole, Saladin, 218-190.

<sup>2</sup> Abu-Sâlib, f. 96.

A. The inferior ranks of the plotters were exiled to Upper Egypt.

The sea attack, which was to have supported the Cairo conspiracy, did not take place till the late summer. The Franks of Palestine did not move when they heard that the plot had failed ; but the king of Sicily, less well-informed, despatched a large fleet, estimated at 252 vessels which arrived off Alexandria on 25 July. The scanty garrison were completely taken by surprise, but they tried to resist the landing, which was nevertheless effected near the pharos. The catapults and mangonels which the Normans had brought were soon plying upon the curtain of the city walls, and the defenders were obliged to fight desperately all the first day till night fell, to resist the storming parties. The next day the Christians advanced their machines close up to the walls, but reinforcements had joined the garrison from the neighbouring villages, and again the attack was beaten off. On the third day, there was a vigorous sortie : the machines were burnt, the enemy lost severely and the garrison returned flushed with triumph. Scarcely were they within the gates, when an express arrived from Saladin, to whom they had sent for support. The courier had ridden from Cairo that same day with relays of horses, and, reaching Alexandria between three and four in the afternoon, loudly proclaimed the approach of Saladin's army. The tidings put fresh heart into the defenders, and they rushed out again in the gathering darkness, fell upon the camp of the Normans, and drove them, some to the ships, some into the sea. The news that Saladin was on the march finished the fiasco : the Normans slipped their moorings and fled, as swiftly and suddenly as they had come. The three days' wonder vanished on the horizon, and Alexandria breathed again."<sup>1</sup>

The conspiracy had been suppressed at Cairo in April; the Norman invasion was repelled in July; in the same month Amalric, the king of Jerusalem, died, and was succeeded by Baldwin, a child and a leper; but meanwhile a still greater obstacle to Saladin's career had been removed in May by the death of Nür-ed-din, the noble sultan of Syria. By this far-reaching event, Saladin became at one bound the leading Muslim sovereign of the near East. His only possible rivals were Nür-ed-din's son, a mere child, in Syria; Nür-ed-din's nephew, Seyf-ed-din, the prince of Adyal and head of the family of Zengi; and the Seljük sultan of Rum or Asia Minor, and none of these was his equal in military power or capacity. To oppose the Crusaders successfully there must be one king and one consolidated Muslim empire, and these several principalities must be brought into line in a general advance. Thus began the second—the Syrian or Consolidating period of his career.

Saladin dealt with them separately. Syria was, of course, his first object. Its child-king was in the hands of a clique, and the scheming emirs were making terms with the Franks. An appeal from Damascus supplied the necessary justification for the first step. With only 700 picked horsemen, Saladin rode across the desert to the Syrian capital and took possession in the name of the child-king.<sup>112</sup> Passing through Emesa and Hamah, he reached Aleppo, where Nür-ed-din's heir, or rather his vizir, prudently shut the gate in his face. Saladin's protestations of loyalty to his old master's son were not believed, and an attempt was made to assassinate him by means of the emissaries of the "Old Man of the Mountain," whilst the Franks, under Count Raymond of Tripolis, made a diversion in favour of their Muslim ally. The siege of Aleppo was therefore raised, and Saladin was checked. He had to be content for the present with the possession of all Syria south of Aleppo.

<sup>1</sup> Lane-Poole, Saladin, 127-8.

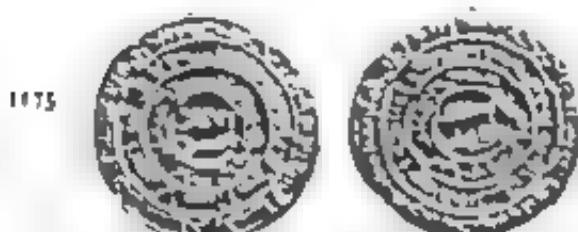

Fig. 44.—Dinars of Saladin, Cairo, 1173.

Nor was he allowed to hold this without interference. The Atâbeg of Môsîl despatched an army from Mesopotamia to combine with his cousin of Aleppo, and the joint forces matched upon Hamah. In face of this formidable attack, Saladin essayed to make terms but all overtures being rejected he won a brilliant victory at the Horns of Hamah, and pursued the enemy up to the gates of Aleppo.<sup>1</sup> A second victory in the following year at the Turkman's Wells, over Sayf ed-din himself, ended in the total rout of the Mesopotamians, and a treaty of alliance with the young king of Aleppo, by which Saladin was recognized as sovereign over all the countries he had conquered, from Egypt almost to the Euphrates.

An interval of six years passed (1177-82) before this first step was followed by the annexation of Mesopotamia. Peace reigned between Saladin and the house of Zengi, and there was also a nominal truce with the Crusaders, negotiated by Humphrey of Toron, whose friendship had even gone the length of admitting Saladin to the rank of knighthood.<sup>1</sup> The organisation of his wide dominions, and the fortification of Cairo, occupied much of his time. The new stone walls were laid out, and the building of the Citadel was begun, though it was not finished till the reign of his nephew Kamil thirty years later. The enceinte may still be recognized through a considerable extent of walls, but the citadel has so often been restored and remodelled by the Mamlûk sultans and by Muhammad 'Ali Pasha, that it is difficult to identify much of the original work;—the founder's inscription, however, may still be read over the old "Gate of the Steps," a dark portal in the west face of the original enceinte. It records how "the building of this splendid Citadel,— hard by Cairo the Guarded, on the terrace which joins use to beauty, and space to strength, for those who seek the shelter of his power,—was ordered by our master the

<sup>1</sup> Technically, Saladin's independent sovereignty dates from this victory, for it was only after this success that he used coins in his own name. As vizier of Egypt he had successively placed on the coinage the names of the kât mid-caliph el-Zâhid (A.H. 565, 566, 1169-71 A.D.), and of Nûr ed-dîn A.H. 567, 569, 1171-4 A.D.), but never his own name. When he occupied Damascus, he placed the name of Nûr-ed-dîn's son as-Sâlik on the copper coins, adding his own as well. In 570 (A.D. 1174-5, but undoubtedly in the latter year) for the first time gold coins of Cairo and Alexandria appeared with the titles of "the King strong to aid Joseph son of Ayyub 'el-Mâlik en-Nâṣir Yâmid ibn Ayyub." The title el-Mâlik en-Nâṣir was bestowed upon him by the Fatimid emir on his appointment as vizier. There is a nearly complete series of Saladin's Cairo dinars from 570 to 589 (1173-93), and a less continuous series of Alexandria from 570 to 583. His Damascus and Aleppo coinages were in silver and copper, and he also used the mint Hamâh.

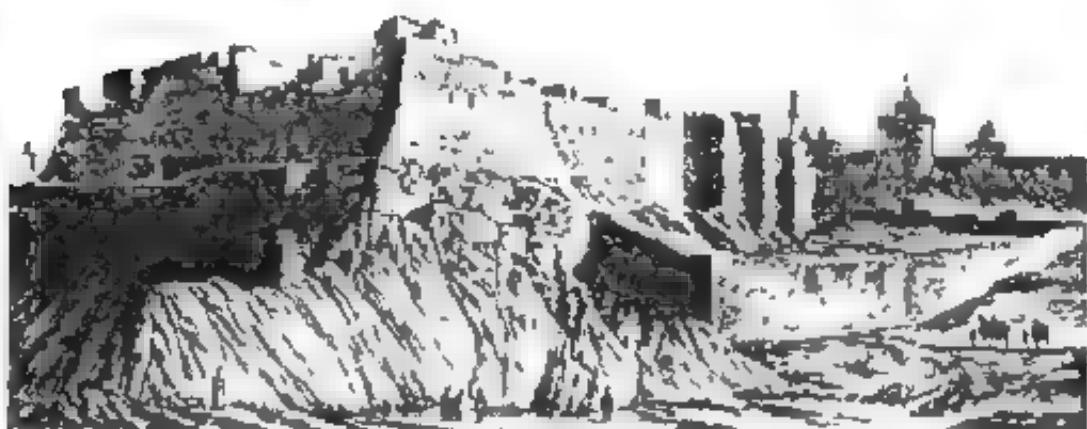

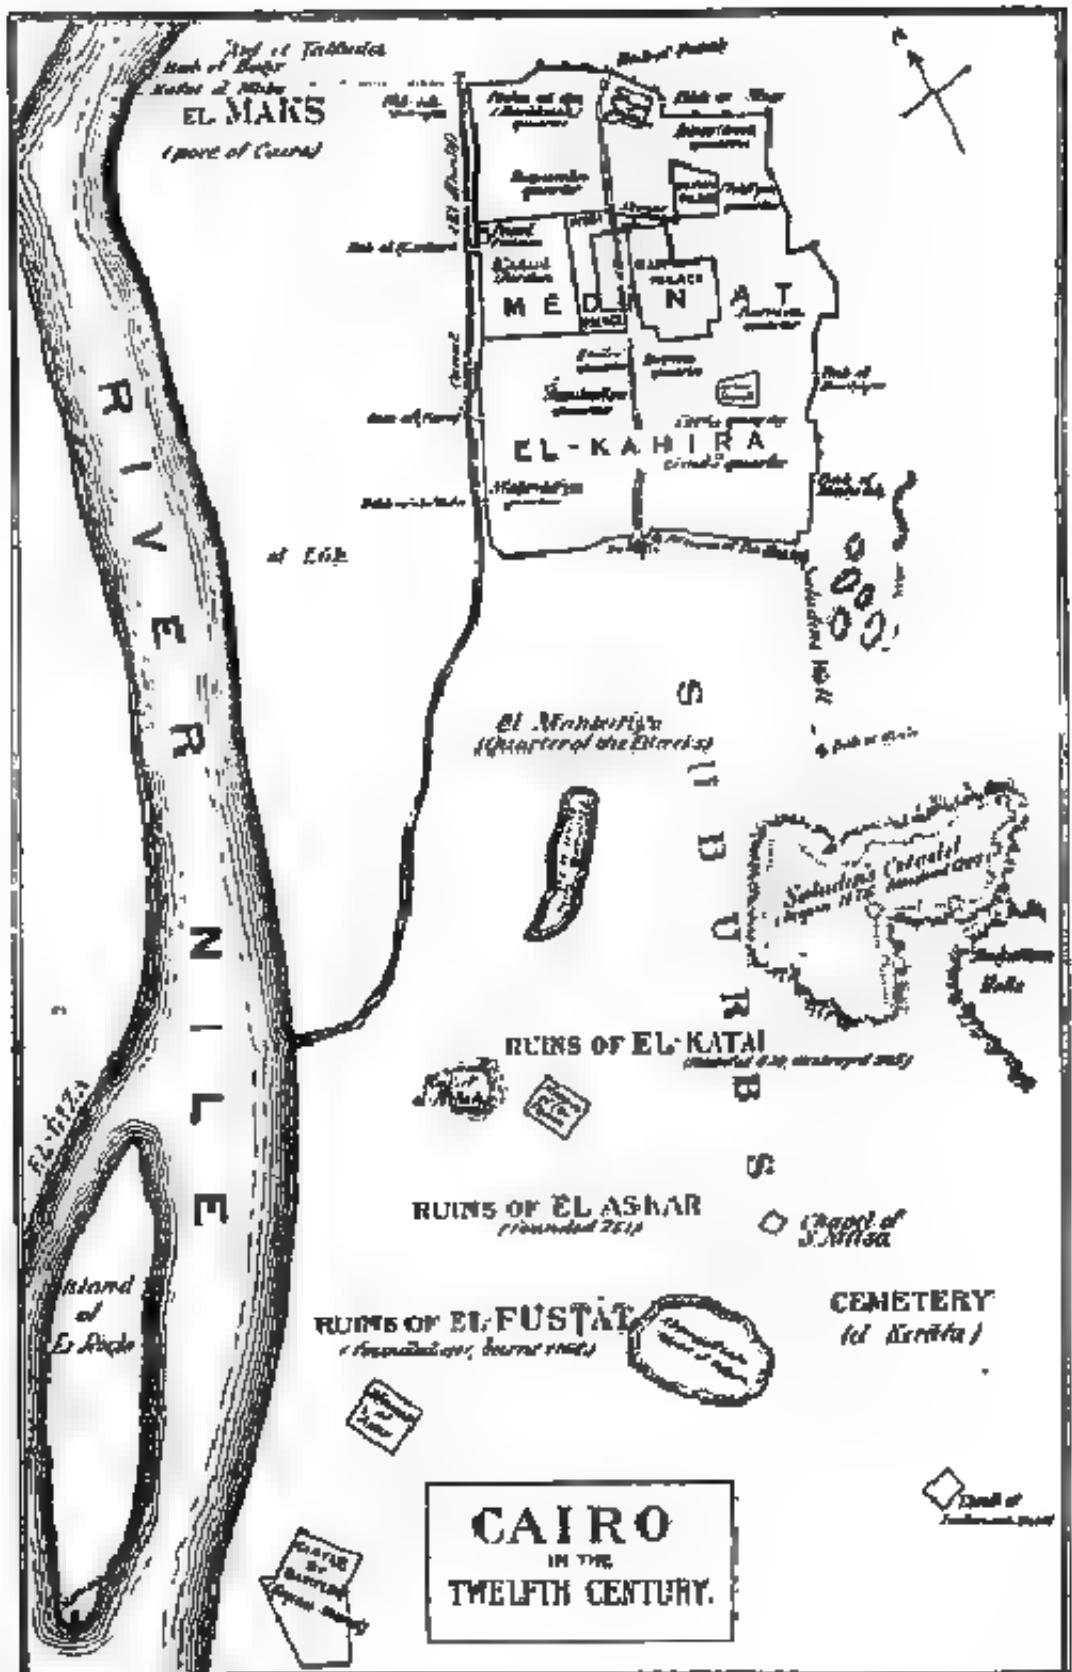

Fig. 45.—Citadel of Cairo (drawn in 1798)

<sup>1</sup> Hist. Reg. Ric., I. 3; cp. v. 11, and William of Tyre, xvii. 17, and l'Ordre de Chevalerie.

<sup>2</sup> See, however, the elaborate historical description of M. P. Casanova in Mém. de la Miss. Arch. vi., and M. van Berchem's Notes d'Archéologie Arabe, Journal Asiat. 1891, where it is remarked that Saladin's citadel and enceinte belong to the French type of defences, introduced by the Crusaders, in contradistinction from the earlier Byzantine type employed by Bedr el-Gemali in the second wall and the three existing gates.

King Strong-to-a-d, Honour of the World and the Faith, Conquest-aden, Yūsuf, son of Ayyūb, Restorer of the Empire of the Caliph ; with the direction of his brother and heir the Just King (el 'Ādil) Saif ed-din Abū-Bekr Muhammad, friend of the Commander of the Faithful ; and under the management of the Emir of his Kingdom and Support of his Empire Karikūsh son of 'Abdullah, the slave of el-Malik al-Nāṣir, in the year 579 (1183-4)."

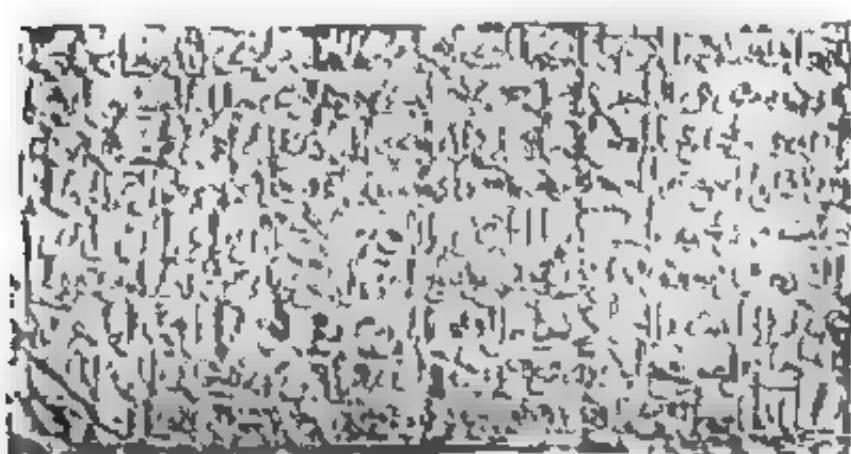

Fig. 46.—Saladin's inscription on the Gate of Steps in the Citadel of Cairo, 1183.

The famous "Well of the Winding Stairs," 280 feet deep, was excavated in the solid rock by the eunuch Karakūsh under Saladin's orders ; but the other buildings (now demolished) associated with his name belonged to later times. The people of Egypt were proud to name public works after their great sultan, and thus his memory is preserved in the Cairo aqueduct (a Mamluk work), and even in the chief canal of Upper Egypt, which is still known as the "River of Joseph," Bahr Yūsuf, though it dates from the time of the Pharaohs. Saladin's chief public work outside Cairo was the great dike of G'iza, built 1183-4) like the Citadel with stones taken from the smaller pyramids, and carried on forty arches along the border of the desert, as an outwork against a possible invasion from the west.<sup>1</sup>

But perhaps none of his innovations had more permanent influence than the medresa or collegiate mosque. Hitherto there had been no theological colleges at Cairo. Beyond the ordinary elementary schools, almost the only lectures that could be attended were given in the old mosque of 'Amr. The Fatimid "Hill of Science" was an exception, but it was largely devoted to initiation into the several degrees of Shī'a mysticism and the discussion of speculative philosophy. The college—or mosque where regular teaching was given, generally quite gratuitously, to all who came—was an innovation from Persia, introduced into Syria by Nūr-ed-dīn, and imported into Egypt by Saladin, who was eager to impart the Shāfi'i form of orthodoxy to the masses of Egyptians. He founded colleges for this purpose at Alexandria and Cairo, the earliest being built close to the tomb of the Imam Shāfi'i himself in the southern Kerāfa or cemetery. Others were the Naṣīra or Sherīfa and Kamhiya colleges near the mosque of 'Amr at Fustat, and the Medresa of the Swordmakers, installed in the old palace of Ma'mūn in Cairo itself. None of these has been preserved, but it is only after Saladin's time that we find the familiar cruciform medresa or collegiate mosque with its four deep porticos where the doctors of the four orthodox sects (Hanafī, Shīfi'i, Ma'lūki, and Hanbali) taught their circles of students.

In the administration of his kingdom Saladin had the valuable assistance of a faithful and learned servant. The Kādī el-Faqīh, an Arab of Ascalon, had been in the secretariate of the Fatimid caliph since the time of el-'Ādil the wezir, and on Saladin's accession to power became his chancellor or wezir, and exercised great influence in that high office during the whole of the reign of Saladin and his son and grandson, until his own death in Jan., 1200. He was famous for his ornate style and the elegant finish of his despatches. Saladin trusted him implicitly. He was as devout and orthodox as his master, and also founded a theological college in Cairo. It was perhaps due to his rigid tenets that the Christians, who had been indulged under the later ignoble Fūṭimids, were subjected, if not to persecution, certainly to confiscations under the enlightened rule of Saladin.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Mahr, Khāqān, II. 204, 251; Ibn Gabeyr, 49.

The six years' interval, however, was not wholly spent in works of peace. There were several brushes with the Franks, who had already forgotten their truce, and forayed the country about Damascus. Saladin retorted by invading their peculiar province, the Holy Land. At Tell G'ezir, near Ramla, he was surprised and utterly routed by king Baldwin backed by 375 knights, and had to ride for his life. It was his first, indeed his only, serious defeat. In three months, however,

1177
Nov.
25

Fig. 47.—Gate of Steps in Citadel of Cairo, 1183.

he was able to take the field again at Hims with a fresh army, and in 1179 he won a brilliant victory over the king of Jerusalem at Marg Oyün (Mergion), and took seventy knights prisoners, including the masters of the Temple and Hospital, Raymond of Tripolis, Balian and Baldwin of Ibelin, and Hugh of Tiberias. The victory was followed by the destruction of the castle at Jacob's Ford which the king had erected as a menace to the Saracens.

1179
July

Aug.

<sup>1</sup> Abū-Šālib, 25a, 67b, etc

Meanwhile the Egyptian fleet of seventy vessels harried the coast of Palestine and brought back a thousand Christian prisoners, who were usefully employed in building the Citadel of Cairo. The winter was spent in equipping a larger navy, and when Saladin opened the campaign in the spring with a combined advance by sea and land, king Baldwin prudently proposed a truce, which was forthwith concluded for two years and confirmed by solemn oath. Turning north to Cilicia, Saladin entered into negotiations with the Seljuk sultan of Konya, the king of Lesser Armenia, and the princes of Mops, G'zira, Irbil, Keyr, and Maridsh, who all set their seals to a solemn pact, whereby they bound themselves on oath to keep peace and amity with one another for the space of two years. For this time war was to be unknown within their borders, and a holy truce, a Miqdâdîya Sûruhâd, was to reign throughout the Near East.

The great truce showed that Saladin's influence now overawed all smaller powers from the Black Sea and the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean, and the temporary union of all the neighbouring Muslim states was a long step towards that united effort which he intended to make against the crusading powers. It was the beginning of the policy which used the warlike tribesmen of Mesopotamia as recruits for the Holy War. The death of Nur-ed-din's son, the king of Aleppo, and the perfidious negotiations between the Mesopotamian princes and the Franks, opened the way; and when Saladin left Cairo, as it proved for ever, on 11 May 1182, it was to carry out his great schemes as the champion of Islam. After some engagements with the Franks, and an unsuccessful siege of Beyrût, he marched into Mesopotamia and subdued the whole country, excepting the city of Mops. Aleppo was purchased by exchange, and, after two unsuccessful but exhausting sieges, Mops at last consented to become Saladin's vassal. By this treaty the whole of Northern Mesopotamia and part of Kurdistan were permanently joined to his empire.

The object of his long and arduous campaigns on the Tigris and Euphrates had been attained. He had now allies instead of enemies on his northern flank. Before this no invasion of the Christian territory could safely be undertaken without posting an army of observation to guard against attack from the north ; but now he could advance with confidence. He had also more troops at his back, and could not only command the full strength of his Syrian and Egyptian levies, but also count upon large contingents from the Mesopotamian provinces. In the Holy War, upon which he was now to embark in deadly earnest, all the great barons of those parts came to reinforce the Muslim army, and the princes of Zeangi's line, the lords of Môsîl, Singâr, Gezira, Irbil, Harrân, and even the Kurds from beyond the Tigris, swelled the general muster with their vassals and retainers.

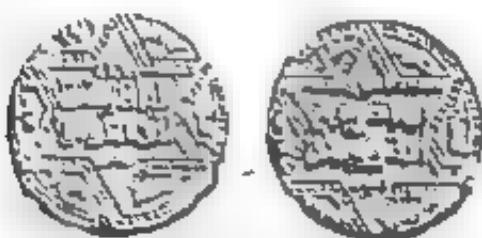

Fig. 48.—Dirhem (silver coin) of Saladin, Aleppo, 1186.

Thus prepared and strengthened, Saladin entered upon the third period of his career—the Palestinian or Aggressive. There had been provocations and reprisals for several years. Reginald of Châtillon, lord of Karak, had entered the Red Sea, seized pilgrim ships, and even invaded Arabia with the intention of destroying the tomb of the Prophet at Medina and the Ka ba <sup>1181</sup> at Mekka. He was pursued by the Egyptian fleet, and his expedition was cut to pieces. In Palestine there had been an indecisive battle near La Fève (el-Fûla), and Oct. twice had Saladin laid unsuccessful siege to Reginald's <sup>1182</sup> impregnable fortress of Karak. A treaty of peace for <sup>1184</sup> four years was then arranged by Raymond of Tripolis, (the regent of the infant king Baldwin V), who was personally on terms of friendship if not actual alliance with Saladin ; but the peace was a hollow form whilst all Europe was beating to arms, and English knights from the Cheviots to the Pyrenees were taking the Cross, and the two great masters were burning, as ardently as Saladin himself, to strike a blow for the faith. The smallest spark would have kindled the conflagration. The spark came from King Baldwin of Châlon who for the third time, in spite of the treaty, pounced upon a peaceful caravan of merchants who were journeying past his stronghold. It was not of a rich prize, but was rumoured to incite the chief Saracen leaders. The provocation was ample. Baldwin vowed to kill the traitor-breaker with his own hand, and kept his word.

The history of the Holy War of 1187 to 1192 is familiar to students, and forms no part of the history of Egypt. The order of events is all that need be mentioned.

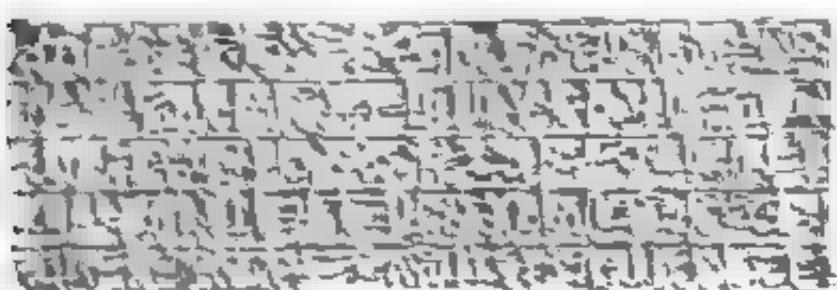

Fig. 40.—St. Anne's inscription at church of St. Anne, Jerusalem, 1192.

The crushing defeat of the Crusaders under their new leader, Guy of Lusignan, at Hattin, near Tiberias, was followed by the rapid conquest of Palestine. Saladin's army spread over the Holy Land, and the whole kingdom of Jerusalem, with the exception of a few castles and fortified cities, was subdued in a month. Ascalon fell in September, and on 2 October Jerusalem itself capitulated on honourable terms. Tyre alone escaped capture in the first rush of conquest, almost by a miracle, and its second successful resistance (Nov., Dec.) was the turning point in Saladin's victorious career. The county of Tripoli and the principality of Antioch, all the coast cities north of Tyre, were easily occupied in a single brief campaign May—Sept., 1188, and Antioch itself was obliged to agree to a humiliating truce. The great inland fastnesses of Belvoir, Safed, and Karak, that still held out, were taken in December and January. Nothing remained of all the conquests of the Crusaders but Tyre and Belfort.

Tyre, however, was the rallying point of the Franks. Thither the garrisons let free by Saladin, with more magnanimity than prudence, as each city or fortress capitulated, immediately betook themselves. Thither came king Guy and most of the nobles and knights who had been released on their solemn pledge never again to bear arms against the sultan. From Tyre marched the army which began the memorable siege of 'Akka,<sup>1</sup> and welcomed the powerful reinforcements of the third Crusade. Tyre was the fatal wooden horse of Saladin's Troy. Had he overcome the impatience or revived the exhaustion of his troops, and sacrificed every other interest to the one object of taking Tyre, there might have been no siege of 'Akka and no third Crusade. Without that ~~two~~<sup>two</sup> even Richard of England would have found it hard to bring his Danish battle axe to bear upon the Saracens.

The siege of 'Akka by Guy of Lusignan began on <sup>1190</sup> 25 August 1190; the siege of the besiegers by Saladin began two days later. The first great battle between the Franks and the double enemy—the garrison within and the relieving army encircling the Christians—was fought on 4 October, and ended in the repulse of the Crusaders with heavy loss. Saladin neglected to follow up his victory, and the Franks spent the winter in entrenching and strengthening their position before 'Akka. In the spring the reports of the approach of the <sup>1190</sup> German crusade under Frederick Barbarossa drew off a large part of the Saracen forces. A second great attack on the Muslims on 25 July, however, was severely punished, but the success was not followed up, and the chances of annihilating the besieging army were sensibly diminished by the landing of Henry of Champagne with 10,000 fresh men. The siege and countersiege went on, with constantly lessening hopes for the Saracens. The

<sup>1</sup> The Arabic 'Akka represents the ancient Acre. The modern French spelling, Acce, should be abandoned in English.

Duke of Swabia brought the survivors of the German army into 'Akka in October, and the first English fleet arrived in the same month. Still Saladin more than held his own. An attempt of the Christians to bring in provisions from Haifa was checked by a strenuous engagement at the Spring-Head, and then winter turned the plain into a sea of mud, and both sides waited for the spring, while famine and fever decimated the Christian camp. Meanwhile Saladin had revictualled 'Akka, and relieved the exhausted garrison.

The leaders of the third Crusade at last arrived : Philip of France at Easter, Richard of England on 8 June. With such reinforcements the long siege soon came to an end. On 12 July 'Akka surrendered. Saladin was no party to this act of the exhausted garrison, but he had been unable to relieve it, and was forced to accept the situation. Negotiations for peace had been opened before the capitulation, and were concluded after it, but some delay in carrying out the stipulations with regard to the surrender of Christian prisoners so exasperated Richard that he massacred 2500 Muslim prisoners in cold blood in sight of the two camps. There was no more talk of peace, and the king of England (Philip had already set off on his return to France) marched down the coast with the intention of taking Ascalon and then striking inland for Jerusalem.

Saladin hung upon the Crusaders during the whole march, but after a defeat at Arsuf he was obliged to draw off his forces to Ramla, and, on the approach of winter, to Jerusalem. Two attempts to march on the Holy City brought Richard actually in sight of his goal, but dissensions in the mixed council of the Crusaders and the increased strength of the Saracens frustrated the design. Richard retired disappointed to 'Akka, and Saladin seized the opportunity to make a dash upon Jaffa, which was immediately relieved and defended by the king of England and a handful of knights—the most brilliant feat of the whole war, of which both sides were now weary. Ever since the battle of Arsuf negotiations for peace had been carried on in a desultory manner ;

but now that Richard was ill and the state of England urgently called for his presence, they were pressed to a conclusion, and a treaty was signed for three years, by <sup>Sept.</sup> which the Crusaders retained the coast cities from 'Akka to Jaffa, and pilgrims were permitted to visit the holy places at Jerusalem.

The Holy War had lasted five years. Before the decisive victory at Hattin in July, 1187, not an inch of Palestine west of the Jordan was in Moslem hands. After the peace of Ramla in September, 1192, the whole land was Moslem territory except a narrow strip of coast from Tyre to Jaffa. To recover this strip the whole of Europe had risen in arms, and hundreds of thousands of Crusaders had fallen. The result hardly justified the cost. Saladin, on the other hand, came out of the war with power unshaken. He had been loyally supported by the whole strength of his empire and his vassals, from Egypt to the Tigris. Kurds, Turkomans, Syrians, Arabs, and Egyptians mingled in his armies, and all were Moslems and his servants when he called upon them for an effort. Not a province had fallen away, only one youthful vassal rebelled for an instant, though the trials and sufferings of the long campaigns had severely taxed the soldiers' endurance and faith in their leader. After the war was over he still reigned unchallenged from the mountains of Kurdistan to the Libyan desert, and far beyond these borders the king of Georgia, the Catholicos of Armenia, the Sultan of Roum, even the emperor of Constantinople, were eager for his alliance. He lived to see the triumph of his life's ambition; he had driven the Christians out of the Holy City and restored the unity of Islam. The exhaustion of the long campaigns, however, had enfeebled his never robust health, and a fever carried him off at Damascus, six months after the peace. The popular conception of his character has not erred. Magnanimous, chivalrous, gentle, sympathetic, pure in heart and life, ascetic and laborious, simple in his habits, fervently devout, and only severe in his zeal for the faith, he has been rightly held to be the type and pattern of Saracen chivalry.

King Strong-to-a-d, Honour of the World and the Faith, Conquest-aden, Yusuf, son of Ayvūb, Restorer of the Empire of the Caliph : with the direction of his brother and heir the Just King (el-‘Ādil) Sevī ed-dīn Abū-Bekr Muhammad, friend of the Commander of the Faithful ; and under the management of the Emir of his Kingdom and Support of his Empire Karākūsh son of ‘Abdallāh, the slave of el-Malik en-Nāṣir, in the year 579 (1183-4)."

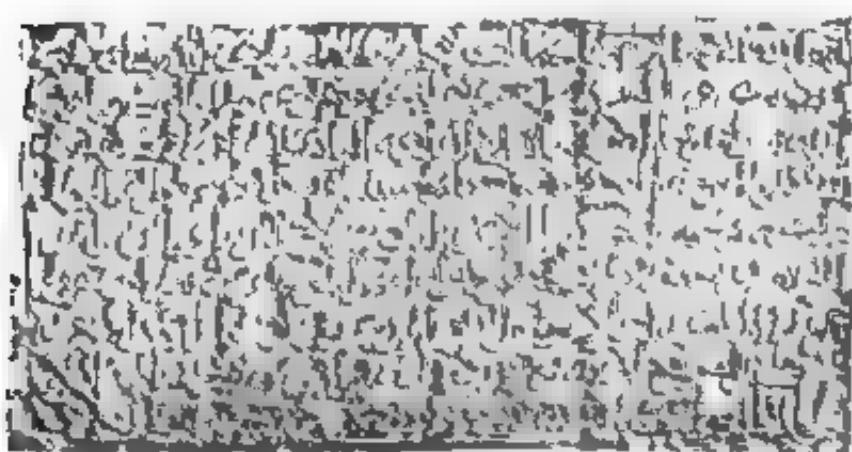

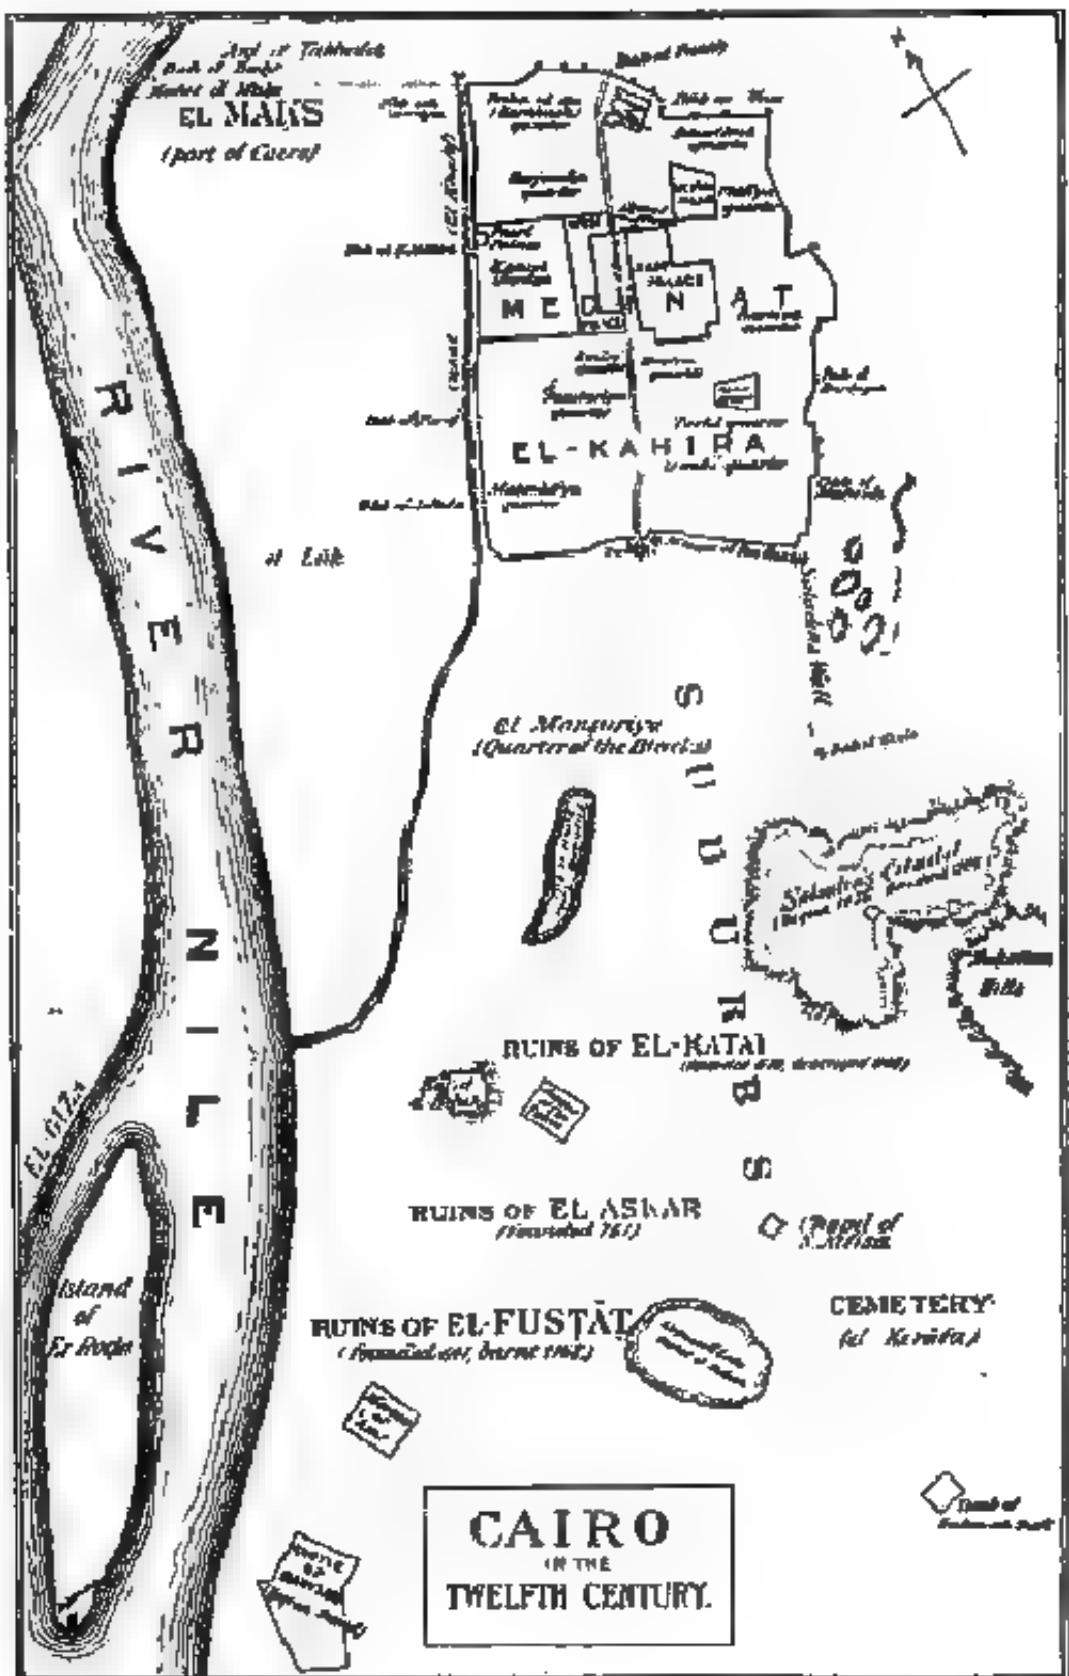

Fig. 46.—Saladin's inscription on the Gate of Steps in the Citadel of Cairo, 1183.

The famous "Well of the Winding Stairs," 280 feet deep, was excavated in the solid rock by the eunuch Karākūsh under Saladin's orders : but the other buildings (now demolished) associated with his name belonged to later times. The people of Egypt were proud to name public works after their great sultan, and thus his memory is preserved in the Cairo aqueduct (a Mamluk work), and even in the chief canal of Upper Egypt, which is still known as the "River of Joseph," Bahr Yūsuf, though it dates from the time of the Pharaohs. Saladin's chief public work outside Cairo was the great dike of Gīza, built (1183-4) like the Citadel with stones taken from the smaller pyramids, and carried on forty King Strong-to-aid, Honour of the World and the Faith, Conquest-laden, Yūsuf, son of Ayūb, Restorer of the Empire of the Caliph : with the direction of his brother and heir the Just King (el 'Ādil) Seyfed-din Abū-Bekr Muhammad, friend of the Commander of the Faithful ; and under the management of the Emir of his Kingdom and Support of his Empire Karakūsh son of 'Abdallāh, the slave of el-Malik en-Nāṣir, in the year 579 (A.D. 1183-4)."

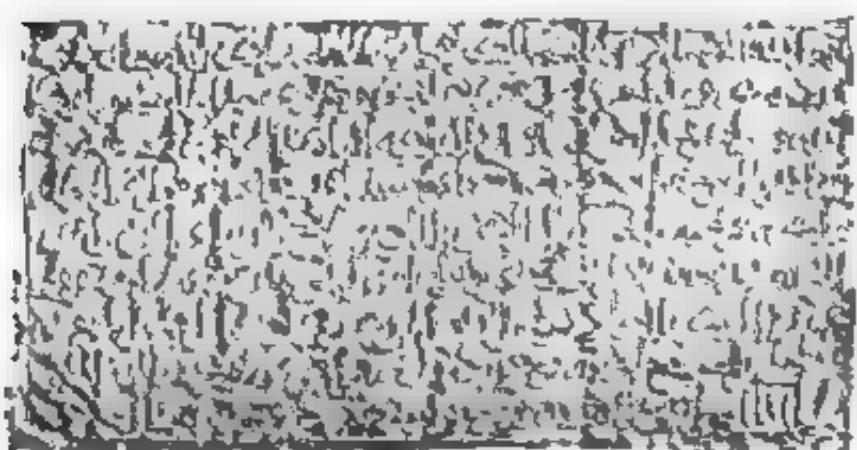

Fig. 46.—Saladin's inscription on the Gate of Steps in the Citadel of Cairo, 1183.

The famous "Well of the Winding Stairs," 280 feet deep, was excavated in the solid rock by the eunuch Karakūsh under Saladin's orders ; but the other buildings (now demolished) associated with his name belonged to later times. The people of Egypt were proud to name public works after their great sultan, and thus his memory is preserved in the Cairo aqueduct (a Mamluk work), and even in the chief canal of Upper Egypt, which is still known as the "River of Joseph," Bahr Yūsuf, though it dates from the time of the Pharaohs. Saladin's chief public work outside Cairo was the great dike of G'iza, built (1183-4) like the Citadel with stones taken from the smaller pyramids, and carried on forty

CHAPTER VIII

SALADIN'S SUCCESSORS (THE AYŪBIDS)

1193—1250

Authorities.—Ibn-el-Athir, Abu-Shama, 'Abd-el-Latif, Ibn-Khalikan, Jonville, Abū'l-Fidā, el-Ma'kīzī, el-'Aynī;—modern Egger, Geschichte der Kreuzzüge, Winkelmann, Kaiser Friedrich II., Röhlert, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Kreuzzüge, and various arts. cf. Regesta regum Hierosol.

Monuments.—Tomb of Imām Shāfi'i, 1211; completion of the citadel of Cairo; medresa of el-Kāmī (almost disappeared), 1224; tombs of emir Ismā'il, 1216, and Sheykh el-Fārisī, 1225; minaret of Qold, Hasaneyn, 1235-6; medresa of 'Abd al-Salih Ayyūb, 1243.

Inscriptions.—On monuments enumerated above; 'Adil on fortress at Mt. Tabor, 1211.

Casket of el-'Adil II in V. & A. Mus., Cairo.—See under each reign.

Since 1182, when Saladin left Cairo for the last time, Egypt had played a subsidiary part in the empire of which it was the head. The centre of politics was removed to Syria, and Egypt had to be content to act as a recruiting-ground for the levies which its sultan was constantly demanding for the reinforcement of his exhausted armies. The practice throughout these wars was to fight in the summer; and when the winter rains stopped military movements in Syria and Palestine the various contingents were sent to their homes to recover health and attend to their farms. In Egypt this practice saved much hardship, for the winter was the season for the principal agricultural operations. During the sultan's absence, his brother el-'Adil Seyf-ed-dīn, the "Saphadin" of the Crusaders, administered Egypt with the assistance of the Kāfi'l cl-Faqīl. In 1184, indeed, he was trans-

THE AYUBID DYNASTIES

The subjoined tables (taken from The Mamlukate Dynasties, by the present writer) show the succession of the various members of the Ayyubid family in the seven chief divisions of the empire. They all descended from five sons of Ayyub—Saladin, 'Adl, Shāhanshāh, Tūrānshāh, and Fughtigin,—except the Emesa branch which descended from Shirkuh, Ayyub's brother. An upright stroke between successive names indicates sonship.

A.—EGYPT.		B.—MUSULMANIA
El-Nasir Salih-el-din Yūsuf (Saladin)	— <sup>A.D.</sup> 1169	El-Walad Yūyūb (son of 'Adl)	— <sup>A.D.</sup> 1205?
El-'Adl 'Othmān (son)	— — 1193	El-Ashraf Mu'īz (son of 'Adl, as Durrat-al-Umara )	1210
El-Mangūr Muhammad	— — 1198	El-Maṣṣafar 'Uthmān (son of 'Adl)	— — 1230
El-'Adil Seyf-ed-dīn (Saphardīn)	— — 1200	— — 1245	— — 1245
El-Xāmil Muhammād *	— — 1218	El.— — 1244	— — 1244
El-'Adil II *	— — 1238	El-Maṣṭafar I Takkeel-el-Umar (son of 'Uthmānsibh)	1278
El-Šalih Ayyub * (brother)	— — 1240	El-Maṣṣafar I Muhammād	1291
El-Mu'ayyad Tūrānshāh *	— — 1249	El-Nasir Kılıç Arslān	1220
El-Ashraf Mu'īz	— — 1250	El-Muṣṭafar I Maḥmūd (brother)	1229
	— — 1252	El-Mansūr II Muhammād	— — 1244
		El-Muṣṭafar III Maḥmūd	— — 1284
			— — 1298

* These Sultans also ruled at Damascus.

L — LEADER , LEADER (son of Suleyman )	1186
El-'Adi Seyf-ed-Din ( see Egypt )	1196	El-Mu'ayyad Mu'l-i-Fidā (the successor)	1310
El-Mu'azzam 'Isā	1218	El-Mid Mūhammad	1333
En-Nāṣir Dīwānī	1237			—1341
El-Ashraf Nūr (of Mesopotamia )	1228
El-Salih Ismā'il (son of 'Alī)	1237	El-Kāfir Mūhammad (son of Shirkūh)	1178
El-Kāmil ( of Egypt )	1238	El-Mu'ājib Shirkūh II	1183
El-'Adī II	1238	El-Manṣūr Ibrāhīm	1239
El-Salih Ismā'il (restored)	1239	El-Ashraf Yūsuf	1245
El-Salih ( of Egypt )	1245			—1262
El-Mu'azzam ( of Egypt )	1249
En-Nāṣir Yūsuf ( of Aleppo )	1250
	1260	El-Ma'āzīqan Tūmānshāh (brother of Saladin)	1171
		Seyf-el-Islām Tuğrul (brother of Saladin)	1181
		Mu'izz-ed-din Ismā'il (son of Tuğrul)	1196
C — ALLEPPO.		El-Nāṣir Yūsuf (son of Tuğrul)	1201
El-Zahir Ghazi (son of Saladin)	1206	El-Mu'azzam Suleyman (grandson of 'Omar)	1214
El-'Azz Mūhammad	1216
En-Nāṣir Yūsuf ( in Damascus )	1236	El-Mustad Salāḥ-ed-din Yūsuf (son of Kāmil)	1215
	1260			—1228

[ face p. 212.

•

Google

Digitized by Google

ferred to Aleppo and his nephew Takī-ed-din 'Omar sent to Egypt instead; but 'Omar proved intractable, and 'Adil was restored to Cairo in 1186, with Saladin's second son el-'Aziz as nominal chief. 'Adil was the ablest of his brother's kinsmen, a good general and hard fighter, but also and beyond all a skilful diplomatist and shrewd politician. He loyally supported his brother in his campaigns, led the Egyptian contingent to the annual rendezvous in Palestine, distinguished himself especially in several engagements on the plain of 'Akka, and was indefatigable in heating up recruits, equipping ships, and supplying stores and money for Saladin's campaigns. He was personally on a friendly footing with Richard of England, and it was he, and not Saladin, who was a guest in the English camp. One of his sons was knighted by Coeur de Lion,<sup>1</sup> and "the noble Saphadin" was the intermediary to whom Richard appealed when he negotiated the treaty of Ramla. Everything indicated el 'Adil as the successor of his heroic brother.

Saladin, however, had naturally ordered the succession in favour of his own sons, three of whom, for some years before his death, had held the governments of the three chief provinces. The eldest, el Afdal, had Damascus and central Syria; el-'Aziz, Egypt, and et-Zahir, Aleppo. Their cousins ruled at Hamah, Hims, and Ba'albek; and an uncle governed the Yemen. Mesopotamia and Diyar-Bekr became the special appanage of Saladin's brother el-'Adil. From the beginning of this division, however, Egypt was clearly regarded as the supreme province. Damascus struck a coin, in the very year of Saladin's death in the name of 'Aziz of Egypt, though Afdal was its own ruler. But whatever homage was paid, there was no unity among the members of the family. 'Aziz besieged his brother in Damascus within the year, and though peace was patched up by the mediation of 'Adil and Zahir, the quarrel broke out again in the following year, when Afdal pursued his younger brother into Egypt as far as Bubays. Again the prudent uncle intervened, aided by the venerable Kadi el-Faïl,<sup>1</sup> who had been Saladin's chief adviser; and 'Aziz found himself saddled with 'Adil as his minister at Cairo, to the detriment of his independent authority. 'Adil had been a loyal right hand to his brother, but he was not the man to let sentiment stand in the way of his own advance. Saladin's sons were breaking up the empire, and 'Adil resolved to reunite it under his own personal command.

<sup>1</sup> Histoire des croisades, v. II. A similar honour was accorded by Frederick II to the emir Bakht-ed-din, the general who afterwards commanded at Mansurah against Louis IX.

The key of the situation he knew to be Egypt. He had carefully argued Afdal out of his design of seizing Cairo, because he wanted it for himself. Afdal, a pleasure-loving, wine-bibbing profligate, would be a danger to Egypt; whereas 'Aziz had all the virtues and the special merit of being peculiarly biddable. He was "full of generosity," says one who knew him,<sup>2</sup> "most brave and modest, a youth of high moral and no touch of avarice: he knew not how to say no." This was the proper instrument for 'Adil to play on. The two agreed to oust Afdal from Damascus, where his tardy self-reform could not efface the memory of his weaknesses. The city was easily occupied, and delivered over to 'Adil as viceroy under 'Aziz. Friendly with Egypt and master of central Syria, 'Adil now went north to settle his Mesopotamian possessions (1198 a), which after Saladin's death had been threatened by his old rival, the Atabeg of Mosul. He speedily reduced the country to order, and from that time up to the Mongol invasion the Euphrates country remained in the hands of his sons.

<sup>1198</sup> 'Adil was recalled from the north by the news of the <sup>1199</sup> early death of 'Aziz<sup>3</sup> from a fever caught whilst hunting in the Fayyûm, and of the immediate arrival of the family scapegrace, Afdal, at Cairo. Here he posed as guardian to his brother's infant heir, el-Mansür<sup>1</sup> and took the opportunity to lead the Egyptian troops to the conquest of Damascus, aided by Zahir of Aleppo, who shared his brother's hatred of their uncle. But 'Adil was at Damascus before them, the besiegers retired, and Afdal was forced to capitulate and to deliver up Egypt. 'Adil was now master of the whole of Saladin's empire;<sup>2</sup> with the exception of Arabia and of northern

<sup>1</sup> El-Fidîl died in Jan., 1199, and his colleague the secretary 'Imad-ed-din in 1201. See Lane-Poole, Saladin, 187-9.

<sup>2</sup> 'Abd-el-Latif, ed. Sayy, 469.

<sup>3</sup> El-'Azîz struck coins at Cairo A.H. 589—595 (1193-4 A.D.); at Alexandria, 589-595; Damascus, 589 and 594, and Aleppo, 593 (1196). The last two were issued by 'Adil and Zâhir, without their own names, in token of vassalage.

Fig. 50.—Dinar of el-'Adil, Alexandria,

1199.

Syria, where the three dynasties of Aleppo, Hims, and Hamah, whilst recognizing his supremacy and rendering military service, maintained their own virtual independence. The child Mansür was soon deposed, and 'Adil appointed his own sons as viceroys (mālik) over the various provinces under his control—el-Kāmil represented him in Egypt, el-Mu'azzam at Damascus, el-Awhad, el-Fāiz, el-Asħraf, and el-Hāfiẓ in the several districts of the Tigris and Euphrates country.

Egypt was still the head of the empire, but it was passing through a period of distress. An exceptionally low Nile produced a failure of the crops in 1201,<sup>1201-2</sup> repeated in 1202, and famine and pestilence ensued. The Baghdad physician, 'Abd-el-Latif, who lived at Cairo for ten years (1194—1204), attending the professors' lectures at the Azhar mosque, records the terrible experiences of the famine. The distress was so desperate that the inhabitants emigrated in crowds, whole quarters and villages were deserted, and those who remained abandoned themselves to atrocious practices. People habitually ate human flesh, even parents killed and cooked their own children, and a wife was found eating her dead husband raw. Men waylaid women in the streets to seize their infants, and baby fricassees and haggis of children's heads were ordinary articles of diet. When detected the criminals were burnt alive, but few were caught. The very graves were ransacked for food. This went on from end to end of Egypt. The roads were death-traps, assassination and robbery reigned unchecked, and women were outraged by the multitude of reprobates whom anarchy and despair had set loose. Free girls were sold at five shillings apiece, and many women came and implored to be bought as slaves to escape starvation. An ox sold for 70 D., and corn was over ten shillings the bushel. The corpses lay unburied in the streets and houses, and a virulent pestilence spread over the delta. In the country and on the caravan routes flocks of vultures, hyenas, and jackals mapped the march of death. Men dropped down at the plough, stricken with the plague. In one day at Alexandria an imam said the funeral prayers over 700 persons, and in a single month a property passed to forty heirs in rapid succession. The depreciation of property was disastrous. Owing to the decrease of population, house-rent in Cairo fell to one seventh of its former price, and the caravans and furniture of palaces were broken up to feed the oven-fires. Violent earthquakes, which were also felt throughout Syria and as far north as Armenia, shook down countless houses, devastated whole cities, and increased the general misery.

<sup>1</sup> El-Mansür's coinage is dated A.H. 595, 596 (1198-9) at Cairo and Alexandria.

<sup>2</sup> El-'Adil struck coins at Cairo A.H. 597—615 (1200—1218); Alexandria, 596—614; Damascus, 599—615; Mayyâfârîn, 591 (1195); Harrân 591. Between 601, 604 (1204-8) His name was also inscribed as suzerain on the coinage of el-Zahir of Aleppo, 599; el-'Adil of Aleppo, 614; and el-Asħraf of Diyar-Bekr, 612.

Meanwhile 'Adil was steadily consolidating his empire. His chief fear was that the Franks might take advantage of the internal divisions among Saladin's successors to renew the crusade. So, indeed, they did, but in so desultory and feeble a fashion that their efforts scarcely injured the Muslim power. Henry of Champagne, the titular king of Jerusalem, was too weak to venture on a forward movement, and was obliged to be content to govern his coast cities and observe the truce which 'Aziz had prudently renewed on his accession. The prince of Antioch and Tripolis was perpetually engaged in keeping his neighbour, the Armenian king of Cilicia, at bay. There was no present danger from the Syrian Franks, and if a new crusade were to be set on foot, it must come from Europe. Again the pope, Celestine III., summoned the Christians to the Holy War. England and France were too busy with their own quarrel to listen to his appeal; but the emperor Henry VI took the cross in 1193, assembled an army of 60,000 men and a fleet of forty-four vessels on the Apulian coast and despatched them under the command of the bishop of Würzburg to Akka, where they arrived in September, 1197. The Germans, however, were no welcome allies to the French followers of Henry of Champagne, and found themselves acting alone. 'Adil took advantage of their hesitation to seize Jaffa, and the death of king <sup>1197</sup> Henry <sup>3rd</sup> almost at the same time produced further confusion. Amalric of Lusignan, king of Cyprus, was chosen to succeed him on the imaginary throne of Jerusalem, and married his widow, Isabella, who had already survived three husbands. Not daring as yet to march on Jerusalem, the Germans, after defeating 'Adil near Sidon, seized Beyrut, which had already been dismantled on their approach, and then in concert with Bohemond of Antioch prepared an attack upon the Holy City. At this moment the news came of the sudden death of their emperor; the Germans abandoned the <sup>1198</sup> siege of Toros (Tubnîn) and hurried home, and 'Adil and 'Aziz were content to make peace.

The Latin Crusade, fortunately for the Muslims, stopped at Constantinople, where it established the Latin kingdom, which lasted for nearly half a century and drew off many adventurers from the Christian forces in Syria. Beyond a few skirmishes in the neighbourhood <sup>1201</sup> of Crac des Chevaliers and Markab, and a raid upon the coast of Egypt, no hostilities of importance took place, and in 1204 Amalric made a fresh truce with the Egyptian sultan, who was glad to purchase tranquillity by the restoration of Jaffa and Ramla to the Franks. A similar truce was concluded with Tripoli in 1207. The sultan was a born diplomatist, and always preferred a treaty to a battle. He secured powerful support and corresponding immunity by the commercial treaty which he negotiated with Venice in 1208, whereby the Venetians acquired special trading facilities in Alexandria and up the Nile in return for their alleged good offices in restraining the Crusaders from an advance upon Egypt. Meanwhile Amalric had died in 1205, and his stepdaughter Mary (Isabella's child by Conrad of Montferrat) succeeded to the crown of Jerusalem, and was provided with a husband, John of Brienne, who was presently to show himself a vigorous Crusader; but at first his forces were unequal to any attempt upon the Holy City. Pope Innocent III again sounded the war-cry, but the first response, to the luckless "Children's Crusade," only filled Egypt with youthful captives, betrayed to the enemy. Ashamed, perhaps, at the heroic example of the "children," Andreas, king of Hungary, supported by the grand-duke Leopold of Austria, Hugh of Cyprus, the king of Armenia, Ranulf of Chester, and many nobles and prelates, landed a considerable force at 'Akka, and Hungarians, South Germans, Frisians, and Rhinelanders, flocked to their standards. They made three useless expeditions, first to Beisan and even beyond the Jordan; then to the fortress which 'Adil had built on Mount Tabor, which they failed to take; and thirdly against Beaufort. The sultan of Egypt watched their movements, but dared not risk an engagement. Finally the king of Hungary went home in deep chagrin, but some of the Germans remained and helped to strengthen the coast fortresses, and especially to build Castle Pilgrim (Mons Peregrinus) near Haifa.

Before this the Crusaders had begun to realize that the best way of overcoming an enemy is to strike at his vital part. Egypt was the vital part of the Muslim empire, and until Egypt were subdued, petty raids in Palestine were merely a waste of strength. Reinforced by a fleet of Frisians and men of the Rhine, John of <sup>1211</sup> Brienne at last plucked up courage to make a descent <sup>Aug.</sup> upon Damietta. The king of Jerusalem was accompanied by the archduke of Austria, Count William of Holland, the Count of Wied, and the masters of the Temple, Hospital, and Teutonic order and a large army was soon encamped on the shore of the delta. Damietta <sup>was</sup> strongly fortified by a triple bastioned wall, by a great tower planted on an island in the Nile, by chains stretched across the river, and by the natural advantages of its position on a peninsula partly defended by water.

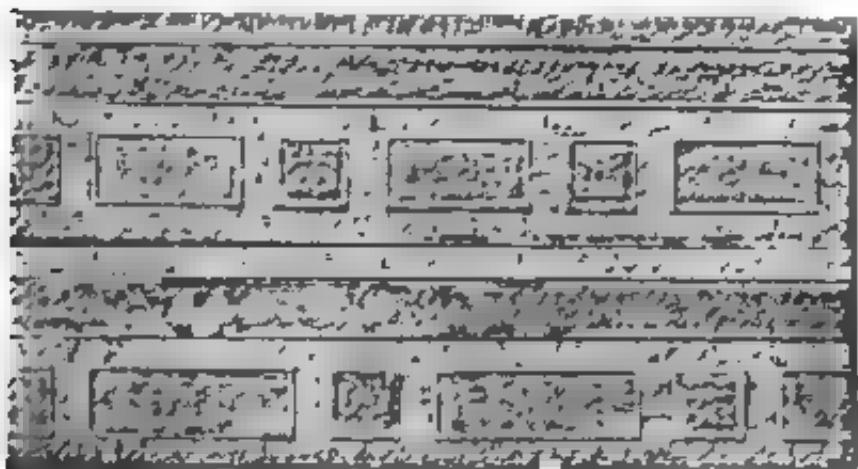

Fig. 51.—Carved border of a sheykh's tomb, 1216.

The Crusaders were on the west bank, and their efforts were directed to capturing the great tower in mid-stream. They set up siege-towers on their ships, with scaling ladders, but the fire and shot of the garrison, strongly supported by Kāmid's army on the east bank, withstood <sup>July 1</sup> their first assault. They then lashed vessels together and built a yet more powerful castle, with a drawbridge and moored it alongside the river tower and on St <sup>Aug.</sup> Bartholomew's Day, after a fierce struggle, the defenders "" were forced to capitulate.

The loss of this bulwark of Egypt killed the sultan

'Adil died on 31 August, 1218, at the age of seventy-three or seventy-five. He had enjoyed a long and brilliant career from the day, fifty years before, when he had entered Egypt with Shirkuh. He had served his famous brother loyally and with exceptional ability for nearly a quarter of a century; and after his death he had spent another twenty-five years in laboriously restoring the powerful empire which Saladin's jealous sons had broken up. He had succeeded in all his plans. Every part of Saladin's empire, except northern Syria, was under his control and governed by one or other of his many sons. Cairo, Damascus, Edessa, Harran, Garbar, Masyatirkin, even the Yemen, had each a son of the great sultan for its governor, and his frequent journeys from end to end of his empire kept each and all in a high state of efficiency and preparedness :—

A Monarch, whose majestic air
Fills all the range of sight, whose care
Fills all the regions everywhere,
Who such a watch doth keep
That, save where he doth set his lance
In rest to check the foe's advance,
His eye with bright and piercing glance
Knows neither rest nor sleep.<sup>1</sup>

'The Franks had been powerless against him ; their little raids had scarcely injured him ; and the few sacrifices of territory he had made—Beyrüt, Jaffa, Nazareth—were well repaid by long intervals of tranquillity, during which he was continually increasing his strength. His personal character must have been attractive, for he won the admiration and friendship of King Richard and many other Crusaders. His oriental biographer<sup>2</sup> describes him as a man of extraordinary prudence and foresight, armed with information and fortified by experience, and therefore fortunate in all his undertakings. He was endowed with remarkable physical powers, sound health, and high spirits; a great eater, who could finish off a roast lamb at a meal; passionately fond of women: he indulged in pleasure with his whole soul, and, like other strong men, made the most of his enjoyments as he did of his work.

<sup>1</sup> Bahā ed-dīn Zuhayr, ii. 258, paraphrased by Palmer to preserve the play upon the Arabic word for slumber or rest. Bahā-ed-dīn was a contemporary poet, who afterwards became the confidant and court poet of al-Salih Ayyub, 'Adil's grandson.

<sup>2</sup> Ibn-Khaikan, iii. 235 ff.

<sup>1</sup> He left to his eldest son the difficult task of driving out the Franks. El-Kâmil<sup>1</sup> inherited many of his father's qualities. He was a good soldier and a skilful diplomatist —too wise, indeed, for the taste of his contemporaries. He set to work at Damietta with great energy, threw a bridge or pontoon over the Nile to obstruct the Frankish vessels, and led repeated but fruitless assaults upon the enemy's position. When the bridge was cut by the Crusaders, he sank ships to block the passage. Camp fever and the Nile inundation did the Christians more damage than his onslaughts, but the very unhealthiness of their camp compelled them to advance. They determined to cross at all hazards, and with this object they deepened a large canal and thus brought their fleet up to a spot thirteen miles south of Damietta. Though at the first attempt they were frustrated by the solid array of Kâmil's troops on the opposite bank, a conspiracy among the leading Muslim generals, which threatened the sultan's throne, if not his life, and forced him to fly by night up country produced such confusion that the Crusaders crossed almost unopposed, captured <sup>Feb.</sup>, the Saracen camp, and closed round Damietta. But their difficulties were not yet over. Kâmil, aided by his brother Mu'azzam of Damascus, raised a new army, harassed the besiegers night and day, burnt their bridges, and destroyed their siege-works and entrenchments. In spite of all his efforts, however the blockade was maintained, and starvation began to do its part. The weary Crusaders were constantly relieved and reinforced from Europe; French and English knights and men-at-arms under the counts of Nevers and Marche and the earls of Winchester, Arundel, and Chester, came to their support ; whilst the still more exhausted garrison steadily dwindled, till of about 50,000 men only 4000 remained able to stand to arms. The contest was too unequal to last much longer.

<sup>1</sup> El Kâmil's coinage is dated Cairo, 616—33 (1219—38); Alexandria 619—34; Mîr, 624; Damascus, 615—19, 627; Harrân, 623, 635. He also is named as suzerain on coins of el-Aziz of Aleppo, 619; el-Wâhid of Diyar-Bekr, 615, and el-Muzaffar of Diyar-Bekr, 618, 632.

Seeing that the sultan asked for terms. He offered to surrender the whole of the kingdom of Jerusalem as it was before Saladin's conquest of 1187, if Damietta were spared. Incredibly as it appears, this amazingly profitable exchange was refused as inadequate : further concessions were demanded. The Crusaders were in no humour for terms of any kind. The papal legate, Cardinal Pelagius, who had been elected commander-in-chief, filled with the exaltation of a pilgrim of the cross, would have no traffic with the "infidels". others held that Damietta was too valuable a commercial centre to be abandoned. The king of Jerusalem and the northern knights in vain urged the advantages of the exchange. The cardinal carried the day, and it was resolved to press the war to the uttermost. The greatest opportunity that the Crusaders had ever been offered was irretrievably lost. When Philip Augustus, who had known how the Saracens could fight before Akka, heard that the Crusaders had refused to take a kingdom in exchange for a city, he exclaimed, "They are tools and simpletons!" It is true ~~Now,~~ Damietta fell by assault, the remnant of the exhausted garrison was ruthlessly massacred, and the alarm of the Muslims was such that they hastily demolished the walls of Jerusalem and other cities in Palestine, lest they might become strongholds of the enemy. But the taking of Damietta did not imp<sup>y</sup> the conquest of Egypt. With their usual incapacity the Franks delayed action, and spent a year and a half at Damietta quarrelling amongst themselves. It was not till July, 1221, that, again strongly reinforced from Germany, they took the field against the sultan. Moreover, they had chosen the wrong route for the conquest of Egypt. Damietta was a valuable port, but it was not the base from which to advance upon Cairo, the essential objective of attack.

Any army marching on the capital of Egypt would naturally choose the old road from Pelusium to Bilbeis. It had been used again and again by invaders, from the days of Cambyses and Alexander to the conquest of 'Amr and the expeditions of Amalric I. Beyond the hardships of a desert march it presented no obstacles to the advance upon Cairo. But between Damietta and the capital lay a network of canals and arms of the Nile, offering a dozen obvious positions of defence, and constituting a series of traps to an invading army which was totally ignorant of the geography of the country.<sup>1</sup>

By this time Kamil had built strong fortifications on the Nile, a little south of Damietta, at a village which he afterwards enlarged into the city of el-Mansura, "the Victorious." He had also summoned his kinsmen, and one and all, laying aside their rivalries in face of the common danger, rallied to his support. Mutazzim of Damascus had joined him from the first and now the princes of Aleppo, Hama, Hims, Harran, and every part of the empire, led their contingents to the rescue of their chief. Never since Saladin lay before 'Akka had the dynasty shown a more united front than when they lined the bank of the Nile to dispute the passage of the Crusaders.

The Franks had advanced southwards, but were duly speedily brought to a stand by the obstacle of Manura and its resolute garrison of hardy Syrians and highlanders from the north, entrenched behind the "canal of Ushmam," the old Tanitic arm of the Nile. The season was ill-chosen, for the river was rising; a number of canals intersected the flat low-lying lands of the delta, impeded strategic movements, and enabled the Muslims to bring up a fleet to their support. As soon as the inundation had risen high enough, bodies of Muslim troops spread over the plains behind and around the enemy, and cut the dams which restrained the Nile waters, the country became a lake, and the Crusaders found themselves on a peninsula, surrounded by water and by watchful foes,

<sup>1</sup> See Oman, Art of War in the Middle Ages, 264-5

Aug. and practically cut off alike from advance or retreat. On the night of 26 August they made their desperate attempt to escape to Damietta by the narrow causeway that still remained passable. Hardly were they in motion when the enemy was upon them from every quarter. The road to the north was already occupied in force by the Saracens. Struggling through the inundated fields, entangled among the deeper canals, the knights fought their way with magnificent valour. For two nights and days the hopeless contest was maintained, and then the Crusaders cried for quarter. The more hot-headed Muslims were for exterminating the "infidels" at one blow, but Kamil, true to the statesmanlike policy of his father, overruled them. He perceived that generous terms would end the war of the creeds, at least for a time, whilst a butchery would infallibly lead to a crusade of revenge and probably nerve the garrison of Damietta to resistance. He allowed the Crusaders to depart.

" they must evacuate Egypt, surrender Damietta, and keep the peace for eight years. The proviso was added, however, that any crowned European king should have the right to break the truce. A fresh reinforcement from Germany about this time landed near Damietta, and took the news of the treaty in very ill part, but repudiation was out of the question, whilst the main army and valuable hostages were still in the power of the Saracens. In a week the whole of the crusading host, which had begun the campaign forty months before with high hopes and signal success, left the shores of Egypt in shame.

All this time there had been no attempt to recover Jerusalem. The neglect was not due merely to strategical reasons. The spirit of the Crusaders had changed, zeal for the faith had mellowed into worldly wisdom. The men on the spot, the Franks settled in Syria, preferred their wealthy coast cities, full of Italian traders and bordered by rich cultivated lands, to the desolate interior of Palestine, laid waste by the struggle with Saladin and the systematic neglect of his successors, who had no wish to tempt the Christians to an occupation. The merchants, and especially the Venetians, seeing no commercial advantages in arid plains, deserted villages, and waterless routes, had fixed their eyes on Damietta and Alexandria, which to them were worth fifty Jerusalems. The old craving for the city of Christ's passion had been quenched in the appetite for wealth. Yet the spirit was not dead: it still animated the indomitable bishops of Rome, and, despite his philosophical attitude towards religion, the call of Christendom compelled the young emperor Frederick II to undertake a new crusade. The peace of 1229 had reserved to a "European crowned head" the right of rupture, and Frederick was clearly indicated in the proviso. He had taken the cross as early as 1215; he had sent troops to reinforce the luckless army in Egypt at the very time of its surrender, in 1223 he married the "heiress of Jerusalem," the daughter of King John of Brienne, and, though Yolande died three years later, he claimed and assumed her crown to the exclusion of her father. His crusade was delayed year after year on one pretext or another, and he brought upon himself the ban of the impatient pope; but at last, despite the papal prohibition, he sailed for Syria, with only 600 knights, more "like a pirate and follower of Mohammad," said Gregory IX, than as a king and a soldier of Christ.

Frederick's Crusade was unique in all its circumstances. He won Jerusalem against the will of the church and without a single battle. His forces, in truth, were too weak to risk an engagement with the powerful armies of the Saracens. His contemptuous treatment of John of Brienne had alienated the sympathies of many of the settled Christians; his contest with Rome lost him the support of zealous churchmen. The religious orders of the Temple and Hospital suddenly refused to follow a leader who was under the curse of the Holy See. No one in Syria seemed to care very much about the recovery of Jerusalem. But Frederick had an argument on his side that outweighed all these negations. Kamil had encountered a rival in his brother Mu'azzam, the lord of Damascus, who was suspected of taking advantage of the exhaustion after the siege of Damietta, and of presuming upon his own services in the war, to shake off the sovereign powers<sup>1</sup> that Egypt claimed over the empire of Saladin. Alarmed at this disaffection, Kamil had sent an embassy to Frederick, as sovereign of the Saracens of Sicily, offering him the kingdom of Jerusalem in exchange for his support. In return Bishop Bernard of Palermo had come on a mission to Cairo, and costly presents had been exchanged. Frederick was on exceptionally good terms with the Muslims, and his toleration gave rise to suspicions of his orthodoxy. The pope, as we have seen, called him "a follower of Mohammed," and the correspondence which has been published between the emperor and the Arab philosopher Ibn-Sabin,<sup>2</sup> together with the metaphysical discussions into which Frederick loved to draw Kamil's envoys after his arrival in Syria, point at least to what we should now call emancipated views, which in those days were apt, in the case of less distinguished advocates, to lead to the stake. An Arab historian confesses that "the emperor was the most excellent among the kings of the Franks, devoted to science, philosophy and medicine, and well-disposed towards Muslims," and twenty years later Joinville found that his kinship to Frederick was the best passport with the mamluks. This toleration, probably shared by Kamil, who had associated with European nobles, doubtless led to a mutual appreciation. There is no evidence that any treaty was signed, but some understanding was arrived at. Meantime the situation was changed. Mu'azzam died in the winter of 1227; the danger of Syrian rivalry was hardly critical enough to press Kamil to any great renunciation, and it says much for the emperor's diplomacy that he was able to bring his Egyptian correspondent to the point of the treaty, signed on 11 February, 1229, and ratified on oath a week later by the two sovereigns. Kamil was no doubt in some measure committed by his previous proposals, but his main motive is to be found in the valuable counter-guarantees of the emperor.

<sup>1</sup> This is denied by Abū-l-Fidā, who says that Mu'azzam was invariably deferential to Kamil, and always caused his name to be recited as sovereign in the public prayers.

<sup>2</sup> Published by Prof. Mehren.

The treaty of 1229 was the most remarkable that was ever signed between a Christian and a Mohammedan power, before the days of European engagements with the Turkish empire. On his part the sultan of Egypt surrendered Jerusalem (which was not to be fortified, however), together with Bethlehem, Nazareth, and the pilgrim road to Jaffa and thence to 'Akka, into the absolute possession of the emperor, reserving only the harem of Jerusalem, enclosing the mosque of 'Omar, for the exclusive use and possession of unarmed Muslims. He also released all Christian prisoners, including many of the unhappy victims of the "Children's Crusade." The emperor in return engaged to defend the sultan against all enemies, even Christians, and guaranteed that the northern Syrian princes of Antioch, Tripolis, and various other places, should receive no assistance from any external power. These engagements were to hold good for ten years and a half.

There is no doubt that, if the treaty were honestly observed, Kamil gained much more than he lost by it. The territory sacrificed was of little value, and the only part of Jerusalem specially sacred to the Muslims was reserved; whilst the advantages of the emperor's defensive alliance were overwhelming. However satisfactory the result may have appeared to the two high contracting parties, the treaty roused a storm of indignation among the zealots of both sides. The Holy City was indeed once more Christian—save one part—but at what a cost of honour! Frederick, said the papal party, had bargained with the "infidels" instead of slaying them. Most of the old Latin kingdom was still in the hands of the Saracens. And the prince of Antioch, and the military orders who held many castles in the north of Syria, deeply resented the clause that cut them off from all succour from Europe; it looked, indeed, very much like a spiteful revenge for their disaffection. The Muslims, for their part, regarded the whole transaction as a shameful betrayal of Islam to the "infidel."

<sup>1229</sup> <sup>May</sup> Frederick entered Jerusalem within a month of the treaty, and, enthroning himself in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, set the crown upon his own head. The next day the archbishop of Caesarea placed the Holy City under an interdict, to the amazement and indignation of the crowds of pilgrims : "the place where Jesus Christ suffered and was buried," they cried, "is banned by a pope!" Scared by the calamity, they hurriedly followed the emperor to Akka, whence, after appointing honest men to govern his new acquisitions, and strengthening by all possible means the Teutonic order, he <sup>1230</sup> sailed for Italy. The Crusade was over, and though it had procured the recovery of Jerusalem, the city was in the midst of a hostile country and could not be held against any attack in force. Kāmil religiously observed the treaty he had sworn (as did the Christians by the pope's reconsidered order), but he could not always prevent bands of fanatical Muslims from ill-using the pilgrims and disturbing the peace of the Holy City. The emperor's haughty treatment of many of the Syrian and Cypriote nobles left unhealed wounds and led to a series of quarrels. The gain to Christendom from the Crusade was insignificant, but the fault lay more with the

Fig. 52.—Eagle on Citadel of Cairo, probably early 13th century.

pope and his supporters than with the indiscreet emperor.

The nine remaining years of Kamil's life were free from crusading molestation, and also from serious rivalry among his own kindred. His title to be the head of the various provinces ruled by the Ayyâbids was generally recognized. He appointed his brother Ashraf as viceroy at Damascus and the two brothers made an expedition into the Euphrates country, and took Amid from the Ortoqid prince whose ancestors had reigned there for 130 years. Kamil endeavoured to cement the family union by marrying his daughters to the princes of Aleppo and Hamah, and though unsuccessful in a campaign against Kay-Kubad,<sup>1221</sup> the Selçuk sultan of Asia Minor, he recovered Edessa<sup>1220</sup> from him, and maintained his authority over the whole of the empire inherited from his father. It was not maintained without friction, for the minor princes of his family regarded him with jealous suspicion and distrusted his crafty diplomacy.

There was a rupture with Ashraf in 1236, and on his death in 1237 Kamil marched upon Damascus to assert his rights as supreme king. The city was defended by his brother es-Sâlih Ismâ'il, supported by the lords of Aleppo and Hims, who were not descended from 'Adil and had always held aloof as they dared from him and Kamil. After a vigorous siege, an accommodation was arranged; the Egyptian sultan<sup>1228</sup> was given Damascus, Sâlih received Baalbek and other cities; and Hims was punished for meddling. But the exposure and hardships of a winter campaign proved too much for Kamil's strength; fever ensued, and at Damascus<sup>Jan.</sup> Mar.<sup>1238</sup> he died. For forty years he had governed Egypt, twenty before and twenty after 'Adil's death. As a statesman he was his father's equal, prudent and firm in counsel, an energetic and capable administrator, who managed his kingdom alone. After the death of his father's wezir, Sâlih-ed-dîn, he employed no prime minister, but performed all the business of the state himself. Egypt prospered exceedingly under his reign. He laboured to improve the irrigation system, personally inspected the work of the engineers, extended and improved the canals, dikes, and dams, ensured the safety of travellers, completed the fortification of the Citadel of Cairo; and being a devout Muslim he founded many institutions, such as the Dar-et-Hadîth or Kamiliya college in the Beyn-el-Kasîeyn. Like most of his family he loved learning and the society of scholars, and was able to hold his own in the literary debates which took place at his Thursday evening receptions.

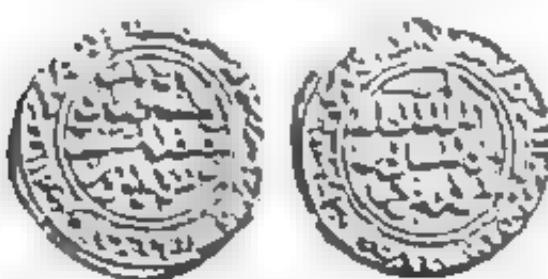

Fig. 53.—Dirâr of el-Kâmil, Alexandria.
1225.

He was succeeded by his son el-'Adil II,<sup>1</sup> a profligate who was deposed by a conspiracy among his officers in a couple of years, when his brother es-Sâlih Ayyûb assumed the throne. The chief event of Sâlih's reign took place in Fig. 54.—Dinar of es-Sâlih Ayyûb, Cairo, 1230.

Syria, where he had a determined enemy in his uncle, es-Sâlih Ismâ'il, who had seized Damascus in 1239 and now sought to strengthen himself by the support of the Franks, to whom he surrendered the castles of

<sup>1</sup> Shekif, Safad, Tiberias, and Ascalon. The Christians, however, were in no very efficient condition. The disastrous crusade of the king of Navarre, the duke of

<sup>1</sup> The younger 'Adil's coins are dated Carr. 635—37 (1238—40); Damascus, 635. He died in prison in the citadel of Cairo in Feb., 1248. There is a casket of inlaid silver and brass bearing his titles in the Victoria and Albert Museum at South Kensington.

<sup>2</sup> Es-Sâlih Ayyûb struck coins at Cairo, 637—46 (1240—48); Damascus, 644, 645, and he is named as suzerain on a coin of es-Nâṣir of Damascus, 647 (1249).

Burgundy, and the count of Montfort, defeated at Gaza, and barely rescued from destruction by the prudence of <sup>***</sup> Richard of Cornwall and Simon of Montfort, paralyzed the energy of the Franks. The savage Khwarizmian tribes, driven westward by the invasion of Chingiz Khân, had called in by Sâlih Ayyûb to aid in the extirpation of the Christians, took Jerusalem, massacred 7000 of the helpless inhabitants, and restored the Holy City once more and finally to Islam. <sup>Sept.</sup> The combined forces of the Franks and the Syrian Muslims were disastrously routed <sup>***</sup> by the Egyptians and Kawarizmians near Gaza; Ayyûb recovered Damascus (1245), and Ascalon (1247); and restored his kingdom to the same height of power that it had reached under his father and grandfather. His vitorious campaigns were only checked by a severe illness, during which he received the despatch announcing Louis IX's invasion of Egypt. He immediately had <sup>***</sup> himself transported in a litter to the threatened scene of war.

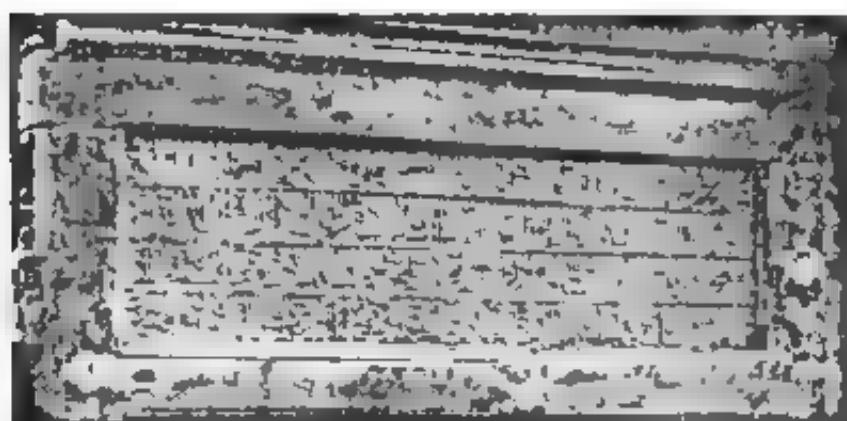

Fig. 55.—Inscription on tomb of es-Sâlih Ayyûb, at Cairo, 1252.

The Crusade of Louis of France was perhaps the only expedition since the days of Godfrey of Bouillon that deserved the name of a Holy War. It was led by a saintly hero, a veritable Sir Galahad, whose 'whole life was a prayer, his whole aim to do God's will', a king whose high and noble character inspired universal trust and reverence; a leader whose courage and endurance rested on the sanctions of faith as well as on the obligations of knightly honour. The very loftiness and purity of his nature, however, were impediments in controlling an unruly and licentious army; but the main cause of his lamentable failure is to be sought partly in his ignorance of the topography of the field of action, partly in the inadequacy of his force. His was no crusade of all Europe, such as St. Bernard had excited; Germany and Italy were absorbed in the quarrel between pope and emperor, and the king of France had to depend mainly on his own subjects. He collected some 3800 French knights, with their numerous squires and men-at-arms, and 2000 archers, and these were joined by small contingents from England, Cyprus, and the Syrian Franks.<sup>1</sup> The French sailed in 1720 ships, but the larger half was dispersed by storms between Cyprus and Egypt and driven into the Syrian ports, and only 700 vessels reached Damietta at the beginning of June.<sup>2</sup> The city was garrisoned by Arabs of the Khâna tribe, famous for their bravery, supported by an Egyptian army under Fakhr-ed-din; but no sooner had the French appeared than the garrison fled, followed by all the inhabitants, and the Egyptians fell back on Mansûra.

Louis occupied Damietta almost without striking a blow. Like John of Brienne he had landed on the wrong side of the Nile, but as the enemy in their haste had neglected to destroy the pontoons, he crossed without difficulty. Again, like his predecessor of thirty years before, he committed the fatal mistake of delaying his advance. His one chance was to push on to Cairo before the Nile rose and whilst the Saracens, panic-stricken at the loss of Damietta, were paralyzed by the illness of their dying sultan, whose stern execution of the fugitive Kinda scarcely reassured his followers. Instead of this, the French waited at Damietta nearly six months, expecting the arrival of the rest of the troops who had been driven to Syria. These reached the seat of war in October, and a debate was then held whether to go to Alexandria or to march direct upon Cairo. It was decided to "strike at the head of the snake," and the now march towards Cairo began. Once more the vicious precedent of 1219 was followed. Forgetful or ignorant of the disastrous lessons then learnt, the Crusaders again risked the endless obstacles of an advance through a country intersected by deep canals and arms of the Nile, instead of choosing a fresh departure and an easy march through open country from Pelusium. They took a month to work their way less than fifty miles up the river, and all this time, during nearly seven months of unexpected grace, the Saracen army had been constantly reinforced, and had so completely recovered from its panic that the Christians were frequently surprised in their tents by adventurous Muslims, eager to win the reward offered for every "infidel" head.

<sup>1</sup> The Arab historians estimate the total force in round figures at 50,000.

<sup>2</sup> According to Juvénal, 27 May; but most authorities place the occupation of Damietta, which took place immediately after the arrival of the fleet, on June 5 or 6.

The French were brought to a stop at exactly the same spot as their unfortunate precursors of 1219. They reached Sharmsa at the corner where the old Tanith branch of the Nile—then known as the canal of Usimum, and now as the Little River (Bahr-e-Sughey'r)—divides eastwards from the great Damietta arm. On their right was the main course of the eastern Nile, in front the Little River, on the opposite side of which could be seen the camp of the Egyptian army resting on the town of Mansura, some four miles south of the point where the rivers divided,<sup>1</sup> and supported by ships on the main stream. To advance, one or other of the two rivers must be crossed, and Louis chose the smaller. He immediately began throwing a dam or causeway across the Little River, and before Christmas he had erected two "cats" or pent-houses to protect the working parties, and a couple of belfries or armed towers to guard the cats. The Saracens on the other side undermined the bank, which was speedily washed away by the stream, so as to maintain the breadth of the channel, and they directed a heavy discharge of missiles from their sixteen stone-slings (pomères, petrariet) upon the French defences. The latter replied from eighteen machines, and an artillery duel was kept up across the river for some time. The causeway was the centre of the attack. The Muslims harassed the working parties by a sustained fire of bolts, arrows, and stones, by land and water, and twice they destroyed the cats and other wooden works by a copious discharge of Greek fire. To add to the dangers of this position, they crossed the Little River at a lower part, and attacked the king's army from the rear. They were beaten off, but Louis had now to entrench his camp on the north-east, and guard it on all sides.

<sup>1</sup> The Rev. E. J. Davis, of Alexandria, in his Invasion of Egypt by Louis IX, 32–34, gives some interesting topographical details derived from local observation and researches. He states that in 1249 the Little River branched off from the Damietta arm some four or five miles south of Mansura, instead of (as now, close to the town) Joinville's name for the Little River, "canal de Kesi," he derives from the village of Derekha, still existing, and not from "Roumia," thus vindicating Joinville from an absurd mistake. He also records the discovery of a large number of skulls, pronounced to be European,

The causeway was still unfinished, the river as impassable as ever, when a traitor—some "infidel of Salmin," it was said—betrayed a secret ford, higher up the Little River, for 500 gold pieces; and on Feb., Shrove Tuesday, the king of France took the flower of his knights, his mounted men, and horse-archers to the place. The cavalry crossed in three divisions or "battles;" first, the Templars, then the second division, and horse-archers, under the king's brother, Robert, count of Artois, and in the rear, the king's battle and his personal following. The passage was unopposed, though not unobserved, but no sooner had the count of Artois reached the other side than, in direct disobedience of the king's orders, he insisted on an immediate ad-scattered over a considerable area, "like a vast cemetery," north-east of Mansura, which he believes to be the remains of the Crusaders who fell in the battle of Shrove Tuesday.

vance against the enemy. The master of the Temple and William Longsword, titular earl of Salisbury, vainly prayed him to wait till the king's division had crossed. He replied with taunts, which left them no option but to join him in his foolhardy gallop. They all charged furiously through the Saracens' camp<sup>1</sup> right into Mansura and out at the other side. They slew the Muslim commander-in-chief, Fakhr-ed-din, who was in the bath and had barely time to get his weapons. He had been knighted by Frederick II, but his knighthood did not save him. The Crusaders broke up into scattered bands, and enjoyed their fill of personal encounters, regardless of any formation or precaution against attack. They were even venturing upon the conquest of the sultan's palace on the river bank behind the city, when their well-deserved fate overtook them.

The ordinary Egyptian and Arab levies had broken in disorder, but the trusty squadrons of perhaps 10,000 mamlûks, whom Salîh had carefully trained as a corps d'élite, were not so easily scared. They rallied near the palace, and their furious charge under Beybars the Arbailesteer turned the fortune of the day. The Crusaders were driven into the narrow streets of Mansura, which were already barricaded and the windows and roofs manned by archers; and here or in the entanglements of the tents the chivalry of France was cut to pieces. The count of Artois and 300 of his knights were killed; of the Templars scarcely five escaped; Longsword and nearly all the English stood their ground to the death; the horse-archers were exterminated, and the Muslims reckoned 1500 knights and nobles among the dead. The remnant were driven towards the Little River, where Louis, after repeated charges, had succeeded in gaining a position opposite the unfinished causeway. In repelling the assaults of the mamlûks, the king exposed himself to great danger, and many of his best knights were captured and rescued. It was impossible with swordsmen alone to drive off the mounted bowmen of the enemy, who held the advantage of a long range ; but the army on both sides of the river had been desperately hard at work building a make-shift bridge over the space still open between the causeway and the south bank. The captured perrées and other engines of the enemy, fascines, and timber of all sorts, furnished the material ; and by sunset the duke of Burgundy, who commanded the camp, was able to send across a body of infantry cross-bowmen, under the constable of France, who effectually covered the exhausted remnant of the cavalry, and compelled the mamlûks to draw off. Before this, however, many of the French, in panic, had plunged their horses into the river in the hope of reaching the camp, and the stream was dark with the floating bodies of drowned men and horses.

<sup>1</sup> This is not clear in Joinville, but appears evident from the letter of Jean Pierre Sarrasin to Nicholas Autore, printed at the end of Michel's edition of Joinville.

The battle of Mansura was but a Pyrrhic victory. Louis indeed held possession of the south shore of the Little River, and had captured the enemy's camp and destroyed their war-engines. But he had lost perhaps half his cavalry and all his horse-archers, and had so little discomfited the Saracens that in three days they were vigorously attacking the bridge-head which he had constructed to guard the causeway, whilst he was only able to maintain the defensive. The battle is a signal illustration of the essential interdependence of cavalry and infantry. Without his foot archers, Louis would have been driven into the river. It was probably inevitable that his advance across the ford should be made by mounted men alone ; but once across, their first object should have been to get into touch with the infantry left behind on the north side, and to complete the bridge. This was clearly the king's plan, and its ruin was solely due to the impetuosity of the count of Artois.<sup>1</sup> fighting of the mamlûks, who bore the brunt of the battle and inflicted the chief punishment upon their rash opponents. Their steadiness was the more remarkable because they were without a king to lead them. Salih Ayyûb had died on Nov. 21, when the French were just setting forth from Damietta on their fatal march. He is described as a prince of strong character, ascetic, taciturn, severe, and intensely proud and autocratic. He was ambitious, and undoubtedly maintained and even enhanced all the power he had inherited from el-Kâmid.<sup>1</sup> His death at the critical moment was a serious disaster. His eldest son Tûrânshâh was far away at Kevîta in Diyar-Bekr. The natural result of an interregnum at such a time would be a struggle between rival emirs for the regency or even the throne, and the collapse of any organization against the enemy. Fortunately, Salih left in his harem a singularly capable woman—a Turkish, or, as some say, Armenian slave, named Sheger-ed-durr ("Pearl-spray"). She at once took charge of the situation. Calling together two or three trusty emirs, she formed her plans in consultation. The sultan's death was concealed; he was given out to be seriously ill, but his meals were regularly sent on to where he was supposed to lie, and the necessary orders of state duly appeared, authenticated by his autograph forged by Suheyl the eunuch. Whatever suspicions may have been aroused, no overt disturbances occurred, and Sheger-ed-durr and her officers managed the government and defence of the country with unqualified success. She was still the mainspring of the state, holding the court, receiving the ministers and generals on behalf of her "sick" master, and watching over the discipline of the army, when the battle of Mansûra was fought. Through all the anxious time between November and February, when the heir, who had been urgently summoned, at last arrived, Sheger-ed-durr held the Muslim kingdom together.

The chief credit of the day belongs to the steady

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Oman has ably criticized the battle of Mansurah in his History of the Art of War in the Middle Ages, 338—50.

<sup>1</sup> He built the castle of Râda, and that of Kebah, between Cairo and Fustat, besides the town of Shâbiya. His tomb-mosque still stands in the Beyn-el-Katreyn at Cairo.

<sup>Feb.</sup> When Tûrânhâh came, she immediately resigned her temporary authority.<sup>27</sup> The young man, who enjoyed no very popular reputation, at least conducted the campaign with energy and skill. His first move was to take a number of ships to pieces and transport them on camel-back to a point on the Damietta arm of the Nile at some distance below the French fleet;<sup>1</sup> there they were put together, and the result of the stratagem was the capture of thirty-two French ships and the stopping of all supplies for the crusading army. Louis was now in a hopeless position. He was not strong enough to break through the enemy and force his way to Cairo; his supplies were cut off, and the troops began to feel the effects of low rations, added to the deadly influence of camp fever. Still he waited, too proud to turn his back upon the enemy, though he retired to the north side of the Little River, still holding the bridge-head on the south. At last he opened negotiations, in the vain hope that the Saracens would renew the terms offered by Kâmil in 1219—an exchange of Damietta for the kingdom of Jerusalem—but this time it was the Muslims who declined the bargain. Finally, when the army was all but starving, and fever, want, and wounds had exhausted its strength, the king burned his war-engines, abandoned his camp and baggage, and set out by night on the desperate retreat towards Damietta, himself taking the post of danger in the rearguard. In the confusion, the bridge and causeway over the river were left standing. The Saracens streamed over in pursuit, massacred the abandoned sick, kept up a running fight as far as Fâreskûr, two-thirds of the way to Damietta, and there made an end of the Christian army. Tûrânhâh himself wrote that 30,000 Crusaders were slain; it is at least certain that almost the whole French host was either killed or taken prisoners, and of the prisoners all except those of gentle birth were massacred.

<sup>Mar.</sup>

<sup>28</sup>

<sup>1</sup> They were probably transported "from the Nile at Semennûd overland to the great canal which issues from the canal of Mahalla a little to the south of the town of that name. In 1249 this canal communicated with the Nile a long distance down by means of a side canal" (Davis, 46).

King Louis was laid low with fever when he was taken, and the Sieur de Joinville, who wrote the moving chronicle of the crusade and himself played a brave man's part in the battle of Mansūra, was also among the captives. They were eventually held to ransom for 100,000 livres (10,000,000 francs) for the lives of the army, and the surrender of Damietta in exchange for the king. It is related that Louis exhibited such regal indifference when the amount of the ransom was stated to him, that Tūrānshāh, not to be outdone, reduced the sum by a quarter. The prisoners went in great peril when the sultan, who had contrived to make himself generally hated in his two months' reign, had offended his stepmother and slighted the Bahri generals, was murdered by the mamlūks.<sup>1</sup> Happily, the woman who had already saved Egypt again assumed the throne, and the terms of ransom were honourably confirmed, in spite of the opposition of the more fanatical Moslems. The French went to Damietta, where Louis's queen had scraped together the stipulated half of the ransom. Thence he sailed in May for 'Akka, with the remnant of Nov. his gallant and unfortunate army. Damietta, which had tempted so many Christian invasions, was soon afterwards razed to the ground and rebuilt on a safer site further inland, whilst a boom was stretched across the mouth of the river.

With the murder of Tūrānshāh, the Ayyūbid dynasty came to an end in Egypt. The mamlūks were now the masters, and their history belongs to the next chapter. Beyond 'Abd-el-Latif's description of the famine years, we have few detailed notices of the internal condition of Egypt under the sultans of the line of Saladin. The general but vague testimony of the historians goes to show that the country was prosperous as a rule, and that the three kings, whose reigns cover nearly the whole interval from 1196 to 1250, were intelligent and capable governors, fully alive to the agricultural interests of the land, and to the importance of order and justice. We hear of no revolts or conspiracies, except against two notoriously unworthy sultans. Of the high character and cultivated tastes of the three chief rulers, 'Adil, Kamil, and Salih, we have contemporary evidence from Ibn-Khallikan, Ibn-al-Athir, and Bahā-ed-din Zuheyr, and it is clear that the society which these learned men, and 'Abd-el-Latif, met in Cairo was intellectually distinguished and found appreciation at the court. Bahā-ed-din was the secretary and intimate of Salih, and his poetry reflects the court life of Egypt before the middle of the thirteenth century. It is not what is generally expected in oriental poetry, but in its playfulness, bonhomie, humour, and light treatment of serious things, it more resembles European vers de société, whilst in some of its panegyrics it succeeds in being stately without affectation, and admiring without servility. The Ayyūbid kings showed a business-like readiness to open the country to European trade. In 1208 'Adil granted special facilities to the Venetians throughout Egypt, and allowed them to build a fundak or mart, called the Sūk-ed-dik, at Alexandria. Similar privileges were granted about the same time to the Pisans, who sent a consul to Alexandria, and these concessions were renewed in 1215-6. The Christian invasion of 1219 naturally interfered with commercial relations, and no further record of trading privileges occurs till 1238, when 'Adil II confirmed their former rights to the Venetians. The duties paid by non-Muslim traders on all goods imported into Egypt was a tenth of their value.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Joinville was an eye-witness of the murder, which was accomplished in the river where the sultan was swimming to escape with a sword stuck in his ribs.

<sup>1</sup> In an interesting description of Fustat, Ibn-Sa'īd, the Spanish Moor, states that "ships and vessels of all sorts arrive from all the lands of the earth at the quays on the Nile. . . . As for the merchandise from the Mediterranean and the Red Sea which comes to Fustat, it is beyond description, for it is here collected, not at Cairo, and from here it is forwarded to all parts of the country." The passage has been translated by Mr. Corbet (see Mrs. Fu cher's Church of Egypt, ii. 148-51).

The relations of the Ayyūbids with their Christian subjects grew more friendly as time went on. Saladin and his brother 'Adil had been severe and exacting, but Kāmil was recognized by the church of Egypt as the most generous and beneficent sovereign they ever had. As prince regent he often interceded with his father in favour of the Christians, and when he succeeded him he continued the same policy, and resolutely refused to meddle in the petty squabbles of the "national church." His correspondence with the emperor Frederick showed a toleration which was rare among Muslims, and apparently led the Christians to believe that the sultan might be converted. St. Francis of Assisi himself visited the court in 1219 and preached before Kāmil, and was at least received with respect, and in 1245 we find Sāliḥ writing to pope Innocent IV regretting that he was unable to argue with the Preaching Friars by reason of the impediment of an unknown language. The crusade of St. Louis, however, exasperated the Saracens, and it is said that 115 churches were destroyed in consequence of the conquest of Damietta.

As a whole the period of Ayyūbid rule in Egypt, in point of imperial power, internal prosperity, and resolute defence against invasion, stands pre-eminent in the history of the country.

CHAPTER IX

THE FIRST MAMLUKS

1250--1277

Inscriptions.—Abū'l-Fida, an-Nawāyīl, al-Mukābi, al-Ayyūb, Abū'l-Mahāsin, etc., buried modern Med., Cronaca der Abbasidenkaiserfamilie in Ägypten; Quatrain of Abu'l-Santuna Mamlik, and Mawātir al-Saqūf; Lam'a Pasha, Art of the Sultans, and Catalogue of Dr. Caves in H.M.; Röhricht, Regesta, Heworth, Hist. of the Mamelukes, iii.

Monuments or Coins.—Tomb-mosque of al-Salih Ayyūb, 1250; tomb of Nur-ed-din, at Icrea (1202), and mosque of al-Zahir Beybars, 1267-9; Dār-al-'Aml, below ramarts of citadel.

Inscriptions.—On monuments above, tomb of al-Ashraf in chapel of Fatima, 1254; tomb of 'Adib al-Kabir al-Harrasī, 1259; tomb of Akbar, 1256; on citadel of Dairāt, 1261; at tomb of Khānd al-Hāmī, 1266, 1267; on white mosque at Kūfah, 1267; at Karak, 1271; at Qāfīd, Cron des Chrétiens, Banias, Tulmus, Lydda, and el-Kāfi (V. van Beethem, Corporal and Zefer Ar al-Syrie, and MSS. more).

Cards.—See under each reign.

THE word mamlūk means "owned," "belonging to," and was specially applied to white male slaves captured in war or purchased in the market. The habit of employing a large body guard of foreign and especially Turkish slaves dates from the time of the 'Abbasid caliphs of Baghdad (see above, pp. 50ff.), who imported the handsome vigorous youth of central Asia to protect them against the Arab tribes and the rising power of the provincial governors, and found that their Turkish guard became their gaolers. In the same fashion the most able and ambitious of the slave generals of the Seljuk sultans became the founders of the numerous independent dynasties that gradually shared what was left of the Seljuk empire. The practice of employing slave officers and troopers naturally prevailed among the dynasties that had risen from the same condition. Nur-ed-din and Sa'adin were surrounded by choice companies of mamluks, brought up with peculiar care, exercised in all manly exploits, splendidly equipped and trained in the art of war. The system of a halka or bodyguard of white slaves or freed men was continued under Saladin's successors, and was brought to the highest pitch of efficiency by his grandnephew as-Salih Ayyub. This sultan had early experience of the jealousies of his kinsmen and the hostility of the Franks; he put little trust in the ordinary Egyptian and Arab levies, and created a small but perfectly trained army of purchased slaves, his personal property, who owed everything to his favour. He imported these mamluks from various markets, but wherever they were bought, the great majority were Turks. The corps d'élite of picked horsemen were stationed at the castle which he had built on the island of Rodz, opposite Fustat, on the Nile, and from their river barracks they acquired the name of the Fluvial or "Bahri Mamluks," "the white slaves of the river." They were not the only mamluks in his service, by any means, but they were the most favoured and powerful regiment. The circumstance of slavery was so far from a stigma that a little later we find a celebrated emir (Kawqun) looked askance upon because he had not been a slave and the relationship of slave to master in the east has always approached kinship more nearly than servitude. The Bahris were proud of their origin, and it formed no bar to their advancement. Their colonels, or "emirs of a thousand," exercised great influence, and one of them, Faris-ed-din Akyūs, succeeded Fakhr-ed-din as commander-in-chief after the battle of Mansura. These officers had already risen before Salih's death, from the ranks of the common slaves to posts of honour at their master's court; they had become cup-bearers, or tasters, or masters of the horse, and had won their enfranchisement; and these freed mamluks became in turn the masters and owners of other mamluks. Thus at the very beginning of their history we find a number of powerful emirs who had acquired a large body of retainers whom they led to battle and who were ready to support them to the death. After the murder of Tūrānshah, which was the work of the Bahris, it was but a short step to the throne, and for the next 130 years the colonels of this celebrated regiment, and their descendants, rapidly succeeded each other as sultans of Egypt.<sup>1</sup> The only title to kingship among these nobles was personal prowess and the command of the largest number of adherents. In the absence of other influences the hereditary principle was no doubt adopted, and we find one family, that of Kaldūn, maintaining its succession to the throne for several generations; but as a rule the successor to the kingly power was the most powerful lord of the day, and his hold on the throne depended chiefly on the strength of his following and his conciliation of the other nobles. The annals of mamluk dominion are full of instances of a great lord reducing the authority of the reigning sultan to a shadow, and then stepping over his murdered body to the throne. Most of these sultans died violent deaths at the hands of rival emirs, and the safety of the ruler of the time depended mainly upon the numbers and courage of his guard. This body-guard enjoyed remarkable privileges and was the object of continual solicitude on the part of the sultan. As his own safety and power depended upon the guards' fidelity, he was accustomed to bestow upon them grants of lands, rich dresses of honour, and unstinted largesse. The greater part of the land of Egypt came to be held by the emirs and soldiers of the guard in fees granted by the crown. These soldiers of the guard numbered several thousand, and must have passed from sultan to sultan at every change of rulers; their colonels became important factors in the choice of rulers, and often deposed or set up a king as seemed good to them. The sultan, or chief mamluk, was in fact more or less, according to his character, at the mercy of the officers of his guard; and the principal check he possessed upon their ambition or discontent was found in their own mutual jealousies, which might be played upon so as to neutralize their opposition.

<sup>1</sup> Some of the following pages are reprinted, with emendations, from my Art of the Sultans in Egypt, ch. iii.

Each of the great lords, were he an officer of the guard, or a court official, or merely a private nobleman, was a mamluk sultan in miniature. He, too, had his guard of mamluk slaves, who waited at his door to escort him in his rickles abroad, were ready at his behest to attack the public baths and carry off the women, defended him when a rival lord besieged his palace, and followed him valiantly as he led the charge of his division on the field of battle. These great lords, with their retainers, were a constant menace to the reigning sultan. A coalition would be formed among a certain number of disaffected nobles, with the support of some of the officers of the household or of the guard, and their retainers would mass in the approaches to the royal presence, while a trusted cup-bearer or other officer, whose duties permitted him access to the king's person, would strike the fatal blow; and the conspirators would forthwith elect one of their number to succeed to the vacant throne. This was not effected without a struggle; the royal guard was not always to be bribed or overcome, and there were generally other nobles whose interests attached them to the reigning sovereign rather than to any possible successor, except themselves, and who would be sure to oppose the plot. Then there would be a street fight; the terrified people would close their shops, run to their houses, and shut the great gates which isolated the various quarters and markets of the city, and the rival factions of mamlûks would ride through the streets that remained open, pillaging the houses of their adversaries, carrying off women and children, holding pitched battles in the road, or discharging arrows and spears from the windows upon the enemy in the street below. These things were of constant occurrence, and the life of the merchant classes of Cairo must have been exciting. We read how the great bazar, called the Khân-el-Khalîl, was sometimes shut up for a week while these contests were going on in the streets without, and the rich merchants of Cairo huddled trembling behind the stout gates.

The uncertainty of the tenure of power and the general brevity of their reigns (they average about five years), make it the more astonishing that the mamlûk sultans found leisure to promote the many noble works of architecture and engineering which distinguish their rule above any other period of Egyptian history since the Christian era. The actual office of sultan was no sinecure, apart from the constant vigilance needed to manage the refractory mamlûks. The sultan was supreme judge, and had to sit regularly, not only to hear causes, but to receive complaints and petitions from any subject who chose to present them. He had to control a large correspondence, and most sultans took a personal share in drafting the dispatches to all parts of the empire and to foreign powers. The most famous and energetic of all the Bahri sultans, Beybars, established a well-organized system of posts, connecting every part of his wide dominions with the capital. Relays of horses were in readiness at each posting-house, and twice a week the sultan received and answered reports from all parts of the realm. Besides the ordinary mail, there was also a pigeon post, which was no less carefully managed. The pigeons were kept in coops in the Citadel and at the various stages, which were further apart than those of the horses, the bird was trained to stop at the first post-cot, where its letter would be attached to the wing of another pigeon for the next stage. The royal pigeons had a distinguishing mark, and when one of these arrived at the Citadel with a dispatch, none was permitted to detach the parchment save the sultan himself; and so stringent were the rules, that were he dining or sleeping or in the bath, he would nevertheless at once be informed of the arrival, and would immediately proceed to disencumber the bird of its message. The correspondence conducted by these posts was often very considerable, as may be seen by an example of the business hours of Beybars. He arrived before Tyre one night; a tent was immediately pitched by torchlight, the secretaries, seven in number, were summoned, with the commander-in-chief, and the adjutant general (Emir 'am) with the military secretaries were instructed to draw up orders. For hours they ceased not to write letters and diplomas, to which the sultan affixed his seal ; this very night they indited in his presence fifty-six diplomas for high nobles, each with its proper introduction of praise to God.

In addition to necessary business, state ceremonies occupied no inconsiderable part of the sultan's time. The marmîk court was a minutely organized system, and the choice of officers to fill the numerous posts of the household, and the tact demanded in satisfying their jealousies and disagreements, to say nothing of the constant presentation of ceremonial dresses of honour, the writing of diplomas, and granting of titles and appanages, must have been a tax upon their master. The posts about the royal person were valuable and highly prized, and it needed some diplomacy to arrange the cabinet and household appointments to the satisfaction of everybody. Besides the great officers of state, such as the Viceroy (Nâib-er-Sultân or Wazîr, Commander-in-Chief (Azîz-îz-Asâkir or Ezir-âl-Kebîr), the Master of the Household (Uşâddâr), Captain of the Guard (Râs-Nâmâ), Armour-bearer (Süahdâr), Master of the Horse (Ezir-Atâkr), Cup-bearer (Sâlik), Taster (Gâzâmekâr), Chamberlain, Equerry, Secretaries, Grooms-in-Waiting, etc., there were many smaller posts, which often commanded great power and influence. The Ezir-Mefîr, "Lord of the Seat," so called because he enjoyed the privilege of sitting in the sultan's presence, was the superintendent of the court physicians and surgeons. The Gawdar, or Master of the Wardrobe, was a high official ; the Ezir-Shâkir, or Grand Huntsman, assisted the king in the chase, the Ezir-Tâber, or Master of the Halberds, held almost the rank of the Captain of the Guard, and commanded the Tâberdârs, or Halberdiers, the Gentlemen at Arms of the sultan, ten in number ; the Baskwâkâr carried the sovereign's slippers ; the Gukandâr bore the sultan's polo-stick, a staff of painted wood about four cubits long, with a curved head ; the Zemâmdârs were eunuch guards. The various household departments had also their officers, who were often great nobles and men of influence in the realm. The Ustadar-as-Sulta presided over the cookery; the Tabb-khākh, or Drummery, was the department where the royal band was kept, and it was presided over by an officer called the Emir-'Alem, or adjutant-general. The sultan's band is stated at one time to have comprised four drums, forty kettle-drums, four hautboys, and twenty trumpets. The permission to have a band was among the most coveted distinctions of mamlūk times, and those lords who were allowed to have a band playing before their gates were styled Emir-Tabb-khākh, or Lord of the Drums; they were about thirty in number, and each had command of a body of forty horsemen, with a band of ten drums, two hautboys, and four trumpets, and an appanage of about the value of 30,000 dirhems. The practice of employing these ceremonial bands went out with the Ottoman conquest.

Then there was the Tıcht-khākh, or Vestuary where the royal robes, jewels, seals, swords, etc., were kept, and where the clothes were washed; the Şarap-khākh, or Buttery, where were stored the liquors, sweetmeats, fruits, cordials, perfumes, and water for the sovereign; and the Havuz-khākh, or Larder, where the food and vegetables required for the day were prepared. At the time of Ketbugha the daily amount of food prepared here was 20,000 lbs., and under El-Nasir the daily cost of the larder was from 21,000 to 30,000 dirhems.

It will be seen that court life was complicated even in the fourteenth century, and the state ceremonies of a mamlūk sultan must have involved as much etiquette as any modern levee, and presented a much more splendid spectacle. When the sultan rode abroad in state, to hold a review or to make a progress through his dominions, the composition of his escort was elaborately ordered. Baybars, for example, rode in the centre, dressed in a black silk gubba, or vest with large sleeves, but without embroidery or gold; on his head was a turban of fine silk, with a pendant hanging between the shoulders; a Bedawi sword swung by his side, and a Dawūdi cuirass was concealed beneath his vest. In front a great lord carried the gulahaps, or royal saddle-cloth, emblem of sovereignty, covered with gold and precious stones ; and over the sultan's head a prince of the blood or the commander-in-chief bore the state parasol of yellow silk, embroidered with gold and crowned with a golden bird perched upon a golden cupola. The housing of his horse's neck was yellow silk embroidered with gold, and a suswari or cloth of red atlas satin covered the crupper. The royal standard of silk and gold thread was borne alüst, and the troops had their regimental colours of yellow Cairene silk, embroidered with the escutcheons of their leaders. Just before the sultan rode two pages on white horses with rich trappings, their robes were of yellow silk with borders of gold brocade, and a tuffet of the same : it was their duty to see that the road was sound. A flute-player went before, and a singer followed after, chanting the heroic deeds of former kings, to the accompaniment of a hand-drum : poets sang verses antiphonally, accompanying themselves with the kemeng and mömil. Tabardars carried halberds before and behind the sultan, and the state poniards were supported by the polo-master (Gökbindir) in a scabbard on the left, while another dagger with a buckler was carried on the monarch's right. Close behind him rode the Gamakdar, or mace-bearer, a tall, handsome man, who carried the gold-headed mace aloft, and never withdrew his eyes from the countenance of his master. The great officers of the court followed, with little less pomp. When a halt was called for the night, on long journeys, torches were borne before the sultan, and as he approached the tent, which had gone on in front and been pitched before his arrival, his servants came to meet him with wax candles in stands inlaid with gold, pages and halberdiers surrounded him, the soldiers sang a chorus, and all dismounted except the sultan, who rode into the vestibule of the tent, where he left his horse, and then entered the great sound pavilion behind it. Out of this opened a little wooden bedroom warmer than the tent, and a bath with heating materials was at hand. The whole was surrounded by a stockade, and the mamlüks mounted guard.

in regular watches, inspected periodically by visiting rounds, with grand rounds twice in the night. The Emir-Bidur, or Grand Doorkeeper, commanded the grand rounds. Servants and eunuchs slept at the door. Joinville describes the sultan's camp at Damietta. It was entered through a tower of fir-poles covered round with coloured stuff, and inside was the tent where the officers left their weapons when they sought audience of the sultan. "Behind this tent was a doorway similar to the first, by which you enter a large tent, which was the sultan's hall. Behind the hall, there was a tower like the one in front, through which you entered the sultan's chamber. Behind the sultan's chamber there was an enclosed space, and in the centre of this enclosure a tower, loftier than all the others, from which the sultan looked out over the whole camp and country. From the enclosure a pathway went down to the river, to the spot where the sultan had spread a tent over the water for the purpose of bathing. The whole of this encampment was enclosed within a trellis of wood work and on the outer side the trellises were spread with blue calico, and the four towers were also covered with calico."

The historian Makrizi is fond of telling how the sultan made his progresses, held reviews of his troops, led a charge in battle, or joined in the games at home. The mamluks were ardent votaries of sport and athletic exercises. Nasir was devoted to the chase, and imported numbers of sunhurs, saliks, falcons and hawks, and presented valuable fees to his falconers, who rode beside him, hawk on wrist. Beybars was a keen archer, and a skilful hand at making arrows. He erected an archery ground outside the Gate of Victory at Cairo, and here he would stay from noon till sunset, encouraging the eunuchs in their practice. The pursuit of archery became the chief occupation of the lords of his court. But Beybars, like most of the mamluks, was catholic in his tastes; he was fond of horse-racing; spent two days in the week at polo; was famous for his management of the lance in the tournaments which formed part of the amusements of the day; and was so good a swimmer that he once swam across the Nile in his cuirass, dragging after him several great nobles seated on inflated carpets.

Such outward details of the life of the mamlûks may be gathered in Maqrîzî; but if we seek to know something of the domestic life of the period we must go elsewhere. We find indeed occasionally in the historian an account of the revels of the court on great festivals, and how there were concerts in the citadel, where a torch was gently waved to and fro to keep the time. But to understand the home-life of the mamlûks, we must turn to the Thousand and One Nights, where, whatever the origin and scene of the stories, the manners and customs are drawn from the society which the narrators saw about them in Cairo in the days of the mamlûks; and the various articles of luxury that have come down to us, the goblets, incense-burners, bowls, and dishes of fine inlaid silver and gold, confirm the fidelity of the picture. With all their prayers and fasts and tedious ritual, the Muslims of the Middle Ages contrived to amuse themselves. Even in their religion they found opportunities for enjoyment. They made the most of the festivals of the faith, and put on their best clothes; they made up parties—to visit the tombs, indeed—but to visit them right merrily on the backs of their asses, and they let their servants go out and amuse themselves too in the gaily illuminated streets, hung with silk and satin, and thronged with dancers, jugglers, and revellers, fantastic figures, Karâkâsh (the oriental Punch), and the Chinese Shadows.

The poet Bahâ-ed-din Zuheyr, the secretary of Sâlih, who survived his master and died in 1258 gives a vivid picture in his verses of the joyous society of early mamlûk times, from which it is evident that there was no very strict observance of the Muslim rule of temperance among the gay courtiers. The wine-cup is as prominent in Zuheyr's poems as in 'Omar Khayyâm's. Many of the mamlûk sultans are described as being addicted to wine, and the great lord Beybars was at one time stated to be incapable of taking part in affairs, because he was entirely given over to drink and hazard. Yet there are redeeming points in this softness. The Muslims of the days of good Harūn, and not less of the other "golden prime" of Beybars and Barkak, did not take their wine moodily or in solitude. They loved to have a jovial company round them, and plenty of flowers and sweet scents on the board; they perfumed their beards with civet, and sprinkled their beautiful robes with rose-water, while ambergris and frankincense burned in the censers we still possess, diffused a delicious fragrance through the room. Nor was the feast complete without music and the voices of singing women, and the scene of their revels was often a palace such as Kubla Khan might have pictured in his dreams. We can scarcely realize now the stately pleasure domes which the mamluks once decreed; how they hung them with rich stuffs, and strewed them with costly carpets, what wealth of carving and ivory-work embellished their doors and ceilings, how delicately inlaid were their drinking and washing vessels, how softly rich the colouring of their stained windows. In this flowering time of Saracen art, a real interest belongs to the life and social condition of the people who made and encouraged the finest productions of the oriental artist. History can show few more startling contrasts than that offered by the spectacle of a band of disorderly soldiers—a standing army of foreigners, rarely intermarrying with the natives, a class absolutely apart—to all appearance barbarians, prone to shed blood, merciless to their enemies, tyrannous to their subjects, yet delighting in the delicate refinements which art could afford them in their home life, lavish in the endowment of pious foundations, magnificent in their mosques and palaces, and fastidious in the smallest details of dress and furniture. Allowing all that must be allowed for the passion of the barbarian for display, we are still far from an explanation how the Turks chanced to be the noblest promoters of art, of literature, and of public works, that Egypt had known since the days of the Ptolemies.

During this brilliant period the population of Egypt was sharply divided into two classes, who had little in common with each other. One was that of the mamlûks, or military oligarchy, the other the mass of the Egyptians. The latter were useful for cultivating the land, paying the taxes which supported the mamlûks, and manufacturing their robes; but beyond these functions, and that of supplying the judicial and religious posts of the empire, they had small part in the business of the state and appear to have been very seldom incorporated into the ranks of their foreign masters. The names<sup>1</sup> of the mamlûks that have descended to us in the accurate and detailed pages of Makriîî are generally Turkish, and even when they are ordinary Arabic names, they were borne by Turks who had put on an Arabic name along with the speech, dress, and country of their adoption. In the glories, military and ceremonial, of the mamlûks the people had no part. They were indeed thankful when a mild sovereign, like Lâzîn, ascended the throne, and when taxes were reduced and bountifully distributed, and they would join, like all mobs, in the decoration of the streets and public rejoicings when the sultan came back from a career of conquest, or recovered from an illness; but they had no voice in the government of the country, and must make the best they might of the uncertain characters of their ever-changing rulers.

<sup>1</sup> It will be useful here to explain the system of mamlûk names and titles. Every mamlûk had (1) a proper name, such as Satibugha, Lâzîn, Baybars, Kalb &c., generally of Turkish derivation. (2) a surname or honourable epithet, as Husnî ed-din, "beauty-blade of the Faith," Nur ed-din, "Light of the faith," Nasr ed-din, "succourer of the Faith." (3) generally a pseudo-patronymic, as Abu'l-Feth, "Father of Victory," Abu'l-Nasr, "Father of Success"; (4) if a sultan, an epithet affixed to the title of sultan or king, as el-Malik es-Sâ'id, "The Fortunate King," el-Malik en-Nâṣir, "The Succouring King," el-Malik el-Mansûr, "The Victorious King"; (5) a title of possession, implying by its relative termination / that the subject has been owned as a slave (or has been employed as an officer or manager) by some sultan or lord, as el-Asrâr, "The slave or mamlûk of the sultan," el-Asrâr, "el-Mansûr," "The mamlûk of the sultan El-Mansûr." The order of these titles was as follows: first, the royal title, then the honourable surname, third, the patronymic, fourth the proper name, and last the possessive. So el-Sultân el-Malik el-Mansûr Hadrîm eln Abâ'l-Feth Lâzîn el-Mâṣîr, "The Sultan, Victorious King, Sword Made of the Faith, Father of Victory, Lâzîn, mamlûk of the Sultan El-Mansûr." It is usual, in abbreviating these numerous names, to style a sultan by his title, el-Mansûr etc., or by his proper name, Lâzîn etc., omitting the rest, while a noble (amir) is conveniently denoted by his proper name alone.

The following list shows the names and order of succession of the twenty-five sultans of the Bahri dynasty, few of whom call for detailed biography:—

	A.D.
Queen Sheger-ed-durr <sup>1</sup>	1250
el-Malik 'Izzed-din Aylak <sup>1</sup>	1250
el-Mansur Nur-ed-din 'Ali b. Aylak	1257
el-Mugaffar Seyf-ed-din Kutuz <sup>1</sup>	1259
es-Zahir Kuka-ed-din Beybars <sup>1</sup>	1260
es-Sa'id Nasir-ed-din Baraka Khan b. Beybars	1277
el-Adil Bedr-ed-din Selamish b. Beybars	1279
el-Mansur Seyf-ed-din Kalâ'un	1279
el-Ashraf Salâh-ed-din Khalil b. Kalâ'un <sup>2</sup>	1290 en-Nâṣir Nasir-ed-din Mohammad b. Kalâ'un	1293
el-'Adil Zeyn-ed-din Ketbughâ <sup>2</sup>	1294
el-Mansur Ilusam-ed-din Lagîn <sup>2</sup>	1296
en-Nâṣir, second reign	1298
el-Mugaffar Rukn-ed-din Beybars II <sup>2</sup>	1308
en-Nâṣir, third reign	1309
el-Mansur Seyfed-din Abu-Bekr b. Nâṣir	1311
el-Ashraf 'Alâ-ed-din Kügük b. Nâṣir	1311
en-Nâṣir Shubâb-ed-din Ahmad b. Nâṣir	1342
es-Sâlih 'Imâd-ed-din Ismâ'il b. Nâṣir	1342
el-Kâmil Seyf-ed-din Sha'bân b. Nâṣir	1345
el-Mugaffar Seyf-ed-din Hâggî b. Nâṣir	1346
en-Nâṣir Nâṣir-ed-din Hasan b. Nâṣir	1347
es-Sâlih Shâfi'ed-din Shâlih b. Nâṣir	1351
en-Nâṣir Hasan, second reign	1354
el-Mansur Shâfi'ed-din Mohammad b. Hâggî	1361
el-Ashraf Nâṣir-ed-din Sha'bân b. Hoseyn b. Nâṣir	1363
el-Mansur 'Alâ-ed-din 'Ali b. Sha'bân	1370
es-Sâlih Shâfi'ed-din Hâggî b. Shi'bân	1381
[Barkuk, Burji mamûk]	1382
Hâggî, second reign, with title el-Manṣûr	1389
	—1390

<sup>1250</sup> After the murder of Tûrânschâh it was inevitable that <sup>May</sup> the mamûks should seize the throne of Egypt, yet

<sup>1</sup> Original Bahri mamûks of Shâlih Ayyâb.

<sup>2</sup> Mamûks of Kalâ'un. It will be observed that from 1290 all the sultans were descendants of Kalâ'un, except those who were his mamûks.

they showed their respect for the late dynasty as well as my gratitude for her former statesmanship by electing Salih's widow, Sheger-ed-durr, as their queen—almost the only queen who has ruled a Mohammedan country before the present Empress of India.

Fig. 36.—Dinar of queen Sheger-ed-durr, Cairo, 1250.

Sheger-ed-durr combined the qualification of a mam uxa and comrade of the Bahris with that of marriage with the Ayyubid sultan, to whom she had born a son. The son, Khalil, died in infancy, but how insistently she based her right to sovereignty upon her motherhood of a prince of the royal line is proved by her official signature on all state documents. She styled herself merely Umm-Khalil (or Wālidat-Khalil), "the mother of Khalil." The prayers were recited in her name, and coins were struck with the feminine titles "el Musta'miya, q-Salhiya, Menkat-el-Muslimin, Wālidat el-Melik el-Manṣur Khalil-Amir-el-Mu'minin," which signify "the [former] slave of [the caliph] Musta'mim [and afterwards] of Salih; queen of the Muslims, mother of el-Melik el-Manṣur Khalil [friend] of the Commander of the Faithful."<sup>1</sup> The first act of the new sultan was to confirm the previous treaty with king Louis, and despatch him and his army safely out of the country. It is at least highly probable that partly to her the Crusaders owed their lives; since in the excitement after the murder of Tūrānshāh, and again when they were drunk with the reoccupation of Damietta, the mamluks were in two minds whether to massacre the Christians or not. The ransom probably turned the scale. Louis's queen, who had been at Damietta, paid the first half of the 800,000 bezants, and the king lost no time in leaving the coast.

<sup>1</sup> The only coin known of Sheger-ed-durr is in the British Museum (Lace-Poole, Catalogue, iv. p. 136), and bears these titles, together with those of the contemporary 'Abbadid caliph Mu'azzin, and the date, Cairo, A.H. 648 (which began 5 April, 1250). The titles are the same as those given in Makrizi. The coin is the sole numismatic record of her reign, which lasted less than three months, and is the only known coin of a Muslim queen, except Rūzīya of Dehli, Abish of Fars, and Nūr-shāh on the Mogul emperor Jahangir's coinage. The queen's surname or takab was 'Asmat-ed-din, "Defender of the Faith," and her royal style was sultān: there is no such feminine form as "sultana" in Arabic. The generic name Sheger-ed-durr, so written by Abu'l-Fida and other historians, is often altered to the noun of unity Shegeret-ed-durr by Makrizi and later writers.

The anomaly of a Muslim queen was too repugnant to Mohammadan ideas to last. The blessed Prophet had said, "the people that make a woman their ruler are past saving," and the caliph of Baghdad, far from being conciliated by the apparent fact that the new sultan of Egypt had once been in his harem, wrote to the Egyptian leaders that "if they had no mawali among them, he would send them one." The hint was taken, and 'Izz-ed-din Aybek, one of the leading Bahris and then atibeg-al-asākir, or commander-in-chief, was chosen by the emirs to be the husband of Shéger-ed-durr and <sup>1250</sup><sub>July 31</sub> sultan of Egypt, with the title of el-Melik el-Mo'tizz.<sup>1</sup>

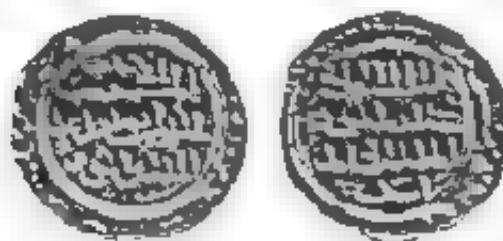

Fig. 57.—Dirhams of Aybek, Alexandria, 1250.

Saladin's great-grandson, had already seized Damascus (which then belonged to Egypt) as a step towards a march

A further precaution was observed in view of the hostility of the Ayyubids in Syria. The descendants of Saladin were not disposed to let Egypt pass from their possession without an effort to preserve it to the family, and en-Nasir of Aleppo, upon the Nile. In order to deprive him of a pretext, the mamluks set up a joint-king, to reign with Aybek, in the person of el-Ashraf Muṣa, a child of six, great-grandson of el-Kāmil.<sup>1</sup> But the real power still rested in the queen's hands; she controlled the finances, refused to inform Aybek where the treasure of the late sultan Salih was deposited, and kept her husband in strict subordination. His real function was to fight the queen's enemies, whilst she managed the internal affairs of state, always, however, in the names of the joint kings, and with the assistance of a military oligarchy composed of the leading mamluks, of whom Ḥāfiẓ, Beybars, and Bulbars were the most prominent and held the chief official posts.

<sup>1</sup> Aybek's rare coins are from old dies of an-Sâlik Ayyub, with the addition of the name Aybek (no title), and with the dates Cairo, 651 and 652 (1253, 1254). No coins bear the joint names of Aybek and el-Ashraf Miṣa.

Aybek had two dangers to guard against, one was invasion by the legitimist Ayyubids of Syria, the other, conspiracy among his brother mamluks and Arab subjects—the risk of trouble from the native Egyptians might be neglected. The most pressing peril was from the legitimists. Already a portion of the mamlūk army at Salihiyā near the Syrian frontier had proclaimed a rival king in el-Mughith 'Omar, a son of 'Adil II and grandson of Kāmil, a candidate with a good title to the throne,—so good, indeed, that his uncle Salih had kept him a close prisoner at Shawbék (Montreal). Thence he had only just been released by his opportunist gaoler, and had immediately occupied the strong fortress of Karak. Aybek's reply to this competition was to throw Egypt under the protection of the caliph of Baghdad, by proclaiming it a province of the 'Abbāsid caliphate and himself as the caliph's viceroy. Having thus set up another legitimist title, far older than that of the Ayyubids, Aybek turned to measures of war. He first sent Ḥāfiẓ, the commander of the Bahri mamluks, to relieve Gaza, which the Syrians were besieging, and meanwhile he exerted himself to convince the people of Egypt of his respect for the late dynasty. The body of <sup>1</sup> Muṣa was the son of an-Naqīz Yūsuf, the son of el-Ma'ād Yūsuf (Kāmil's son) who ruled the Yemen from 1215 to 1228.

<sup>129</sup> Salih Ayyub was removed from the castle of Rûja, where it had been hurriedly concealed by Sheger-ed-durr, and <sup>130</sup> was accorded a magnificent funeral in the tomb-mosque (still existing) which she had built for it in the Beyn-el-Kaureyn : Aybek and Asaraf, the joint-kings, and the officers of state attended in great pomp ; all the mamluks were dressed as mourners in white and cut off their hair ; the tomb was reverently covered with banners, and the bow and quiver of the late sultan were laid upon it. The people were also encouraged to believe that the Ayyubid opposition was divided, that Mughith of Karak had become the ally of Aybek, and all sorts of false rumours were put about.

<sup>131</sup> Nevertheless everybody predicted the triumph of the old dynasty, and when Nâṣir of Damascus arrived on the frontier, the people of Cairo were confident in his success and prepared a welcome. Aybek and Aṭṭâl, with a large army of mamluks and Arabs of Upper Egypt, met the legitimist command near 'Abbâsa, and an obstinate battle ensued. The Egyptian Arabs, routed at the first onslaught, fled to their homes, announcing on their way the defeat of Aybek. Cairo at once ranged itself on the side of the supposed victor ; Nâṣir's name was honoured next day in the Friday prayers, and preparations were made for his entertainment. The battle, however, was not over when the Arabs fled ; the Egyptian right drove in the Syrian left ; the centres were evenly balanced, and the issue wavered. At last, the desertion of Nâṣir's mamluks to their comrades of the other side turned the scales, and the remnant of the Syrian army fled to Damascus, abandoning camp and baggage and losing many killed and prisoners. Among the latter, who graced Aybek's triumphant entry into Cairo, was <sup>132</sup> Shâfiq Ismâ'il, the former lord of Damascus (see p. 220), and several other princes of Saladin's blood. Ismâ'il was paraded before the tomb of his old rival, Sâlih Ayyub, and strangled in the Citadel as an inveterate enemy of Egypt.

Encouraged by this victory, Aybek sent Aṭṭâl to recover Gaza and Palestine, and took the opportunity of increased prestige to depose his nominal partner, the <sup>109</sup> child Ashrat, and send him away to Constantinople (1254). Meanwhile the caliph intervened to promote a peaceful understanding between his contending subjects of Syria and Egypt. His motive was evident. the Mongol invasion was already touching his frontiers the barbarians were in Diyar-Bekr, and it was imperative to sink all minor differences and present a united front to the enemies of Islam. Peace was arranged by ambassadors <sup>110</sup> from Baghdad on the basis that Egypt should hold <sup>111</sup> Palestine west of the Jordan, including Jerusalem and the Muslim part of the coast. The treaty was renewed in 1256, when Nāṣir abandoned his protection of Egyptian malcontents, and Aybek had no further trouble from the legitimists.<sup>1</sup>

The danger from the intrigues of his own household was more difficult to guard against than the open attacks of the enemy. Akṭāi, who was the most distinguished of the mamlūk generals and had not only completed the discomfiture of Louis IX but repeatedly beaten the Syrians, was a serious rival to Aybek. The Bahri mamlūks would obey no other leader, and with Akṭāi's connivance this truculent soldiery became a terror to the inhabitants, they indulged their licence in atrocious acts of violence, pillaged innocent houses, and railed the public baths for women. The very Franks, says Maqrīzī, could not have done worse. To add to the general anarchy, the Arabs of the Qūd broke into revolt with the cry of "Egypt for the Arabs," not the Turks, and this race movement became so popular that the Arabs were able to muster some 12,000 horse and a multitude of foot soldiers. They were met near the apex of the delta by Akṭāi with only 3000 of his trusty mamlūks, but his usual skill and their courage once more brought victory. A campaign in the north quickly reduced the Arabs of the delta who had caught the spirit of revolt, and Aybek treacherously entrapped their leader and many of his followers, and punished the tribes by increased taxation. The result was their ruin. The Arabs of Egypt had been rich and owned many horses and large herds : henceforward, says the historian in the fifteenth century, they were reduced to the state in which they now decline.

<sup>1</sup> The Egyptian frontier, according to Abū-l-Fidā, was then fixed near al-'Arish, as it is to day.

This latest triumph made Akthār more insupportable than ever ; and Aybek resolved to get rid of him. The general was trapped in the citadel of Cairo, and his head was thrown to his escort standing below the walls. Many Bahri mamluks, appalled at this sudden blow, fled the country, and some who stayed behind were arrested. For the moment Aybek had saved his throne. The exiled mamluks, however, remained a perpetual menace : they raided Palestine, sought to stir up Nāṣir at Damascus, and when he was induced by the caliph to dismiss them, they joined Mughīṭa at Karak and hovered on the borders of Egypt. Aybek spent the best part of three years in camp on the frontier, guarding against their attack. He was now bent on legitimizing his title, and sent an embassy to the caliph at Baghdad to request the robes of honour and usual insignia of investiture. At the same time he proposed to marry a daughter of Lu lu, the prince of Mosul. This produced a final rupture with his wife, Shergār-ed-durr, who, although she lived on the worst terms with her husband, was intensely jealous of sharing him with other women. She had already made him divorce a former wife, and she would not tolerate a fresh marriage, especially to a princess of rank. Aybek had been told by the court astrologer that he would die of a woman's plot, and he was privately warned that the queen was meditating his removal. He seems to have entertained corresponding designs on his own part, but she anticipated them. Inviting him to the Citadel with every assurance of sincerity, she had him murdered in his bath. When it was done, she tried to pass it off as a natural death, but the mamluks soon extracted the truth from tortured slaves. In vain the queen offered the throne to several nobles ; none dare to accept so perilous a gift. The mamluks would have killed her in their ury, but the old ties of comradeship secured her the protection of the Bahris, who had moreover no cause to love Aybek. She was shut up in the Red Tower, and foreseeing her doom the heroic lady devoted her last hours to pounding her jewels in a mortar, that no other woman should wear them. Three days later she was <sup>1137</sup> dragged before the wife whom she had compelled Aybek <sup>11</sup> to divorce, and in her rival's presence queen Sheger-ed-durr was battered to death by the wooden clogs of the women slaves. They threw her half naked body into the citadel ditch, where it lay several days to be devoured by dogs, until at last some one buried it. Her tomb still stands near the chapel of Sitta Nesira, and some pious modern hand has covered it with a cloth embroidered with her name. Her end was like Jezebel's: yet she had saved Egypt.

Aybek's son (by the divorced wife) was set upon the vacant throne by the choice of the mamluks, but the lad of fifteen, who spent his time in the frivolous amusements of cock-fighting and donkey-rides, was only a make-shift to avoid a struggle between the jealous emirs. El-Melik el-Manṣūr 'Alī,<sup>1</sup> as he was styled, was no sovereign for the crisis at hand, and in Nov., 1259, he was deposed by the regent, Kuṭuz (formerly Aybek's <sup>1139</sup> deputy or nāib-al-Saltana) who ascended the throne with the title of el-Melik al-Muqaffar.<sup>2</sup> As he observed to his followers, this was no time for boy puppets, "we want a fighting king." The danger now was not from the legitimists, for Kuṭuz had completely routed the Ayyābid el-Mughith of Karak when he attempted with the support of the exiled Bahris to conquer Egypt. A far greater peril threatened the whole Mohammadan east in the advance of the Mongols under Hulagu, who took Baghdad and murdered the caliph in Feb., 1258, conquered all Syria in 1260, and pushed on to Gaza, harrying and destroying everything in their way. Hülegü sent an embassy to the sultan of Egypt, bearing a letter full of menace and requiring his abject submission. Kutuz replied by executing the ambassadors and hanging up their heads at the gate Zawia. He would have no parleying with the enemy, lest some of the fainthearted emirs should be won over. As it was, he had to administer a stern reproof to them before he could lead a united and determined army to the frontier. Murmurs were stilled, and courage raised, when Beybars with the vanguard drove the Mongol garrison out of Gaza, and the whole army of Egypt marched north along the coast, secured the neutrality of the Franks of 'Akka, and then went to encounter the barbarians. They found them near Beylin at Goliath's Spring ('Avn Gā'ūd—a famous site in Crusading warfare), and the tremendous shock of the Mongol charge shattered the Egyptian militia. But the headlong flight led to victory, for the Mongols, dispersed in pursuit, lost formation, and were easily cut off by the steady attack of the unshaken mamluks. The Mongol general, Ketbugha, fell, and his army was soon in full retreat, joined by the garrison of Damascus, where the Muslims immediately rose and slew its Christian population, who had triumphed prematurely over the downfall of Islam. Kutuz restored order throughout the devastated cities, replaced the Ayyubid princes as tributaries in their old seats at Hims and Hamah, and the public prayers were recited in his name as far as Aleppo and the Euphrates. As he was returning in triumph from the brilliant campaign which had rescued Egypt and recovered Syria, he fell a victim to the jealousies which are the inevitable bane of a military dictatorship. Beybars, the ablest of his generals, balked of his desire for the government of Aleppo, Oct. 24 conspired with other nobles, and Kutuz was assassinated whilst returning from the chase within the Egyptian frontier. The chief regicide was elected sultan on the spot Beybars—or et-Sultān al-Malik al-Zāhir<sup>1</sup> Rukn-ed-

<sup>1</sup> A gold coin of el-Manṣūr Nāṣir-din 'Alī bears the date Cairo, 636 (1258).

<sup>2</sup> A gold coin of el-Muqaffar Seyf-ed-din Kuṭuz has the date 638 (1259-60), but the mint is effaced, and a silver coin has the mint Damascus, but the year effaced.

<sup>1</sup> "The Ascendant King, prop of church and state, Beybars [mamlik] of the Arba'eteen [and] of et-Sulib." He first chose the title el-

dunyā-wa-din Beybars el-Bundukdārī eg-Sāhibi—was the real founder of the mamlūk empire. His predecessors had barely and briefly held their power against rivals, revolts, and foreign foes: Beybars made himself supreme over all. He was a native of Kipchak, between the Caspian and the Ural Mountains,—a tall ruddy fellow, with blue eyes, one of which was disfigured by a cataract: hence he only fetched about £20 in the slave market. He had belonged to the emir Aydekin el-Bundukdār, "the arbalester," whence his epithet el-Bundukdārī, which Marco Polo wrote "Berideocquedar." Afterwards he passed into the service of Sāliḥ Ayyub, and became one of the most conspicuous of the Sāliḥi or Bahri mamlūks, especially distinguishing himself at the battle of Mansūra. He was the first great mamlūk sultan, and the right man to lay the foundations of the empire. "Bondogat," says William of Tripolis, "as a soldier was not inferior to Julius Caesar, nor in malignity to Nero"; but he allows that the sultan was "sober, chaste, just to his own people, and even kind to his Christian subjects." So well did he organize his wide-stretching provinces that no incapacity or disunion among his successors could pull down the fabric he had raised, until the wave of Ottoman conquest swept at last upon Egypt and Syria. To him is due the organization of the mamlūk army, the rebuilding of a navy, the allotment of fiefs to the lords and soldiers, the building of causeways and bridges, and digging of canals in various parts of Egypt. He strengthened the fortresses of Syria and garrisoned them with mamluks; he connected Damascus and Cairo by a postal service of four days, and used to play polo in both cities within the same week. His mosque still stands without the north gates, and his college once stood—only an angle remains—in the Reyn-e-Kareyn. He founded an endowment for the burial of poor Muslims. In many respects he was a great ruler, and his qualities must have been remarkable to have raised him from the level of a one-eyed slave to be the consolidator of an empire that lasted for 250 years.

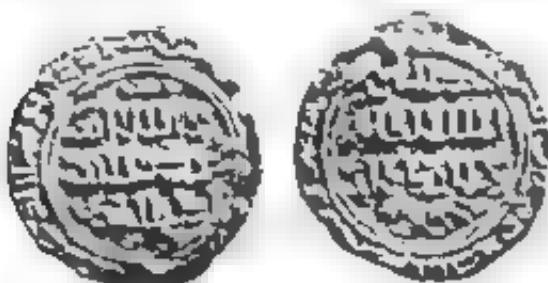

Fig. 58.—Dinar of Beybars, Alexandria, 1261.

Kāhir, but this was found to possess unlucky precedents, and was changed for eg-Zahir, "the Ascendant." After re-establishing the 'Abowād caliphate at Cairo he added the title Kasim-Amir-al-mu'minin, "partner of the Commander of the Faithful." His coinage (like most of the mamlūk currency) is frequently so rubbed as to be illegible, but there are dated coins of Cairo, 664, 665, 666, and 667 (1265-9); Alexandria, 659, 661, 664, 667 (1260-9); and Damascus and Hama, with uncertain dates. His coins bear his badge, a lion passant—a notable innovation in the Egyptian type of currency. The name is usually written Beybars, but on the coins the y is not inserted, and the name would appear to be Bibars, as Quatremere spells it.

<sup>1261</sup>
<sup>OCT.</sup> Beybars was determined to be a second Saladin, to revive the power and prestige of the Egyptian empire, and to wage war against the "infidels" who still lingered on the Mediterranean coast. Syria had indeed been recovered by his predecessor,—and Beybars was careful to confirm his local appointments and conciliate the governors,—but it was held on a precarious tenure. A rival proclaimed himself king at Damascus, and though suppressed (Jan. 1261) his ambition was significant. The first object of the new sultan was to keep

Fig. 59.—Lion of Beybars on base of mosque-door, 1268.

(1) the Mongols—who now formed an established dynasty known as the Ilkhans of Persia or Hulaguids—on the further side of the Euphrates; the second object was to punish the Crusader states which had made common cause with the barbarians against the remnant of the once extensive caliphate. In order to emphasize his position as the pre-eminent sultan of Islām, he not only spent largely upon mosques and pious endowments, but invited an exiled representative of the extinguished 'Abbāsid caliphate to come to Cairo, where he enthroned him with splendid pomp as the rightful pontiff of Islam,<sup>1</sup> with the title of Mustansir, and received from him the gold-embroidered black turban, the purple robe, and the gold chain and arketi which denoted the duly appointed and spiritually recognized sovereign of the caliph's realm.

Having thus acquired the title to act as the head of the Muslims Beybars set about consolidating his power by alliances with foreign princes. By a fortunate coincidence Baraka, the khan of the Golden Horde, or Mongols of Kipchak, who pastured in the valley of the Volga had embraced Islam, and was in deadly rivalry with his kinsmen the Ilkhanis of Persia. Embassies were exchanged (1261-2) between Baraka and Beybars, accompanied by valuable presents, and the two became allies against Persia.<sup>2</sup> Baraka's name was even prayed for next to the sultan's on Fridays in the mosques of Cairo, Jerusalem, Mekka and Medina, and his daughter became the wife of Beybars. The sultan's envoys went to the khan by way of Constantinople, where a friendly understanding had already been established with the emperor Michael Palaeologus, who was naturally disposed to side with anybody who was the sworn foe of Latin Christianity, as represented by the Crusaders, from whose violence and misrule the East Roman empire had suffered for half a century. Beybars at the emperor's request had supplied a Melekite patriarch for Constantinople, now at last reclaimed to the orthodox church; and in return Michael had authorized the restoration of the old mosque which had existed in his capital for centuries until destroyed by the Latins. Another embassy from Cairo waited upon Almred, king of Sicily and Tuscany, who, as the son of Frederick II. and the enemy of the papacy, welcomed the envoys, though he had no assistance to give. Commercial treaties, moreover, were signed between the sultans of Egypt and James of Aragon, and afterwards (1271-2) with Alfonso of Seville. Charles of Anjou, brother of Louis IX., sent a mission to Cairo in 1264. An ally was also found in Kay-Khusru, one of the struggling Selruk princes of Asia Minor, then falling under Mongol sway. All these engagements display Beybars in the character of a prudent and far-sighted statesman; but it was the alliance with the powerful-khan of the Golden Horde that preserved the Muslim empire from serious invasion by the Mongols of Persia. They did indeed repeatedly attack Bira, at the passage of the Euphrates, and pushed a raid into Syria as far as Apamea; but Beybars wisely laid the northern districts waste, that the invaders should find no food or fodder, and thenceforward, though a perpetual menace, the Mongol armies effected no important successes during his reign.

<sup>1</sup> At first Beybars seems to have contemplated the restoration of the caliphate at Baghdad, and furnished the caliph with an army and a splendid retinue for his purpose, but when the actual advance upon Mesopotamia began, his fears were excited lest a restored caliphate might prove hostile to himself, and he left the unlucky Mustansir almost unsupported to make the attempt, in which he apparently lost his life. Another Abbassid caliph was then set up at Cairo (1262) with the title of al-Hakim; but there was no more talk of reconquering Baghdad, and thenceforward the second or Egyptian dynasty of Abbassid caliphs were restricted to such spiritual functions as the ritual of the mosque afforded. They formed, however, the traditional centre of Islam, and used to connect the old caliphate of Bagdad with the powers in Asia of Turkey, to whom they transmitted such rights as they were able to bestow. The succession of the Abbassid caliphs of Egypt may here be noted.—al-Mustansir 1261, al-Uthman I 1262, al-Hakim II 1262, al-Mustadil 1262, al-Mutawakkil I 1262, al-Mutta'im 1277, al-Mutawakkil restored 1277, al-Walid II 1283, al-Mutta'im restored 1286, al-Mata'lik, third time, 1299, al-Musta'in 1305 (or Jan 1412), al-Mutadil II 1413, al-Mustakfi II 1440, al-Kamil 1451, al-Mustansir 1464, al-Mutawakkil II 1470, al-Mustamik 1499, al-Mutawakkil III 1499, al-Mustamik restored 1516, al-Mutawakkil III restored 1521, to assumption of caliphate by Ottoman Sultan 1534.

<sup>2</sup> Detailed accounts of the Egyptian embassy in 1261 to the khan of the Golden Horde are given by Ibn-al-Farid and by Nasiriyah, translated in Quennear's Makrizi, I. 213, note. The envoys went to Constantinople enroute to the Crimea, and thence to the Tali (Volga) where they found the camp of Baraka. Ambassadors from Baraka reached Cairo in 1263.

There were, however, sympathizers with the Mongols along the Syrian coast who had to be dealt with. The Franks, especially Bohemond VI., prince of Antioch and Tripoli, finding them disposed to favour Christianity at the expense of Islam, were supporters of the Ilkhans. Consequently they were special objects of Beybars's attack. For ten years 1261 to 1271—he waged almost annual campaigns against the Crusader states. At first these were merely raids into the territory of Antioch, Cilicia, and the district of 'Akka, accompanied by much cruelty and devastation, or enlivened by great battles of game. Amongst others, the church of Nazareth was destroyed. In 1265, however, he began a series of conquests. In that year Caesarea and Arsuf were taken <sup>1265</sup> and razed to the ground, lest they should again become <sup>1265</sup> strongholds of the "infidels." By a refinement of insult the Christian defenders of the conquered fortresses were compelled to help in their dismantling, and then led with broken crosses round their necks, and banners reversed, to grace the victor's triumphal entry into Cairo. Dervishes and fakirs, seconded by religious women, had encouraged and inflamed the zeal of the Muslim troops and worked at the trenches; and Beybars himself toiled like a navvy at the demolition of the fortifications. In 1266 the troops were again called out from their homes ; <sup>1266</sup> razed to the foundations :<sup>1</sup> its fine marbles were used to decorate the mosques of Cairo. Sheikf Armin (Belfort) surrendered in April, and the crowning triumph of the campaign was the storming of Antioch, the head-quarters of Christianity in northern Syria. The noble city was burnt to the ground.

<sup>Mar.</sup> and after piously visiting Jerusalem and Hebron and distributing alms, the Sultan seized 'Akka, raided the Christian lands about 'Akka, Tyre, and Sidon, and won Safed, after three attempts to storm it, from the Templars, who were nearly all slain. Unlike the coast <sup>July</sup> towns, Safed was now garrisoned and its fortifications strengthened. In all this Beybars took a personal share, encouraging the men by taking the post of danger, helping in the labour of bringing up the siege train, and displaying unwonted solicitude for the sick and wounded, providing hospital tents, physicians and surgeons. At the same time he severely repressed disorder and pilage in Muslim territory forbade wine to be used in camp, and set the noses of officers who indulged in private looting or damage to the crops. In the autumn he again overran the dominions of the king of Little Armenia (Cilicia) as far as Tarsus, and Haithon purchased <sup>1267</sup> peace by the surrender of Derbeşik and the country east <sup>1268</sup> of the Geyhan river. Jaffa was captured in 1268, and <sup>1268</sup>

Beybars took the occasion of the conquest of Antioch to write to its prince, Boemond VI, one of those boastful and sarcastic letters for which he was famous. Addressing him as "count," since he had now lost his principedom, he reminds him that he has been "looking on like a man in a mortal swoon" whilst piece after piece of his dominions has been taken from him. Then the conqueror describes the campaign which ended in the storming of Boemond's capital, sparing him no details: "Hadst thou but seen," he wrote, "thy knights trodden under the hoofs of the horses ! thy palaces invaded by plunderers and ransacked for booty ! thy treasures weighed out by the hundredweight ! thy ladies bought and sold with thine own gear, at four for a dinar ! hadst thou but seen thy churches demolished, thy crosses torn in sunder, thy garbled gospels hawked about before the sun ; the tombs of thy nobles cast to the ground ; the monk, the priest, the deacon slaughtered on the altar ; the rich abased to misery, princes of royal blood reduced to slavery ! couldst thou but have seen the flames devouring thy halls ; thy dead cast into the fires temporal, with the fires eternal hard at hand ; the churches of Paul and of Cosmas rocking and going down ! —then wouldst thou have said, 'Would God that I were dust !' . . . This letter holds happy tidings for thee : it tells thee that God watches over thee to prolong thy days, inasmuch as in these latter days thou wert not in Antioch ! Hadst thou been there, now wouldest thou be slain or a prisoner, wounded or disabled. A live man rejoiceth in his safety when he looketh on a field of slain . . . As not a man hath escaped to tell thee the tale, we tell it thee; as no soul could apprise thee that thou art safe, while all the rest have perished, we apprise thee."<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> There had been a treaty between John of Ibelin, count of Jaffa, and the Ayyūbid sultan, en Nisr, of Damascus, which Beybars confirmed in a personal interview with John in 1268. The death of John of Ibelin, however, terminated the agreement.

This loss so dispirited the Franks that they asked for peace, and Beybars himself accompanied his own ambassadors into Tripolis, disguised as a groom, in order to spy out the place with a view to a future siege. The Franks of 'Akka also opened peace negotiations, which fell through. A raid upon the country near Tyre and 'Akka in 1269 was followed by a more vigorous campaign in 1271, when the great castle of Crac des Chevaliers (Him el-Akrâd) was surrendered by the Hospitallers;<sup>2</sup> Tortosa and Marakab won a truce by a sacrifice of May territory; Akkâr capitulated, and the Teutonic king its "were unable to defend the fortress of Montfort (el-Kurejn).<sup>3</sup> "Our yellow flag hath overcome thy red," wrote Beybars again to Bohemond, "and thy bells are silenced by Alâîn Akbar," the call to prayer. After further hostilities Tyre made terms by dividing its territory with Egypt; and Hugh III of Cyprus, styling himself king of Jerusalem, succeeded in obtaining a treaty of peace for 'Akka and Cyprus for ten years, ten months, and ten days.<sup>4</sup> This arrangement was partly due to the arrival of reinforcements from England, under prince Edward Plantagenet, in May 1271, who inspired the 'Akkans to renewed courage and even secured a couple of small successes; and partly to the threatening movements of the Mongols, who made incursions into northern Syria in 1271 and 1272. The Egyptian fleet, moreover, had been disastrously wrecked at Limasol in an attempt to conquer Cyprus—the main support of Bohemond—and Beybars was busy repairing the injury by the rapid construction of fresh vessels. On the death of Bohemond in 1275, peace was renewed with his successor, who agreed to pay an annual tribute of 20,000 D.<sup>5</sup>

The Franks were now harmless, and before this another.

<sup>1</sup> The letter is printed in Arabic (from Neweyrl) and French in Quatremère, Vérités, L. II. 290-4. In German in Wet., IV. 63-7, and the spirited Eng. ver. is by Sir H. Vane, Mare Poole, I. 25.

danger had been removed by the submission ~~of the~~<sup>1</sup> "Assassins." These fanatics of the Isma'lian sect, secure in their nine rocky fortresses among the Anti-Liban mountains between Markab and Hamah, had been the terror of Syria since the beginning of the twelfth century, and their shâlikhs or emissaries had carried out the lethal orders of their sheykh in many a secret murder. Saladin had vainly attempted to suppress them, and since his failure they had been courted by many Christian powers, and were under the special protection of the Knights Hospitallers. In 1267, however, by a treaty with the knights, Beybars took over the tribute of the Assassins, and having acquired an influence over them<sup>1</sup> he set about disarming their power. Between 1269 and 1273 he took their fortresses one by one, by force or by capitulation, and induced the most dreaded of all secret societies to take up its abode in Egypt, where it gradually lost its fanatical character and became merged in the peaceful population.

Meanwhile, relieved from hostilities on the Syrian coast, Beybars turned his arms northwards, once more he overran Cibea, surprised and burnt el-Maqana and Sis, and raided up to Tarsus, where the prayers of Islam were recited in triumph. He had defeated the Mongols near Bir'a early in 1273, after swimming the Euphrates at the head of his troops; and in 1277 he waged his last campaign against the most powerful of his foes. They now ruled Asia Minor and the young Seljuk princes by means of a governor, or Perwina, Mu'in-ed-din, and against him Beybars led the yellow standards of his ever-victorious army. Near Abulusteyn he fell upon the enemy, with his 11,000 mamluks, and inflicted so terrible a defeat that the Mongols left nearly 7000 dead upon the field.<sup>10</sup> Their camp was taken and the prisoners put to death. The sultan seated himself upon the throne at Kayseriya (Caesarea) where the Seljuk sultans of Rûm had reigned for two centuries, and here he received the homage of the people, was prayed for in the mosque, belauded by the poets, hymned by the royal Seljuk band; and here he caused coins to be struck in his name, and divided the Pervana's treasure among the troops. Here too he received the allegiance of the Turkman ruler of Karaman, whose tribemen proved a useful buffer on the northern frontier. It was but a temporary occupation, for the Persian Ilkhan was already mustering a vast army to recover his losses, and Beybars prudently returned to Syria, leaving Caesarea to the pitiless butchery of the enraged Mongols: but the glory of having sat on the Seljuk throne was not the least among his triumphs.

<sup>1</sup> Beybars was reported to have urged the Assassins to the murderous assault upon Edward Plantagenet, but he strenuously denied the charge.

Nor was this northern expansion the only side on which the empire of Egypt was enlarged. Slightly more permanent was the annexation of the Sudan. Dāwūd, the Christian king of Nubia, who should by ancient custom have paid an annual tribute of slaves to the sultan (see above, p. 21), had sent various expeditions into the Egyptian territory, and taken Muslims captive at Aswān on the Nue and at Aydhāb on the Red Sea coast. In return the Egyptian governor of Khūs had raided Nubia as far as Dongola in 1272-3; and in 1275 Beybars seized the opportunity of the arrival of Dāwūd's nephew Shekenda in Egypt to espouse his cause and set him up in opposition to his uncle. A fresh army was sent into the Sudan, the forts of Daw, Sūs and Dongola were taken, Dāwūd defeated, and Shekenda set upon the throne, after taking the most solemn and ~~an~~ tremendous oath by all he held sacred to be a true and loyal vassal to the sultan of Egypt, to render the customary dirh of slaves, and to pay half the revenue of the kingdom, together with various elephants, giraffes, panthers, dromedaries, and oxen, as tribute, as well as a gold dinar for each adult male of the population, who were also compelled to take an oath of allegiance. The conquest of the Sudan had been attempted before in 652, and again by Saladin's brother in 1173, but its dependence had been merely nominal, and such it soon became again.

Beybars had now reached the goal of his aspirations.

The slave had risen (by a twofold murder of his leaders, it is true) to become the greatest sultan of his century. His orders were obeyed from the fourth cataract of the Nile to the river Pyramus, and on the east from Birā along the Euphrates to Karkis̄ya on the Khabur. The Bedawis of the deserts were his auxiliaries, the sherifs of the holy cities of Arabia were under his control, all Syria was subject to him, save the few cities on the coast which the Christians still held, and the principality of Hamāh. The king of the Yemen courted his friend slip, and sent him costly gifts; the ruler of Abyssinia sought a patriarch at his hands. Sawākin on the Red Sea was his, and the chiefs of north Africa from Barkā westwards paid him tribute<sup>1</sup>. At the height of his <sup>1197</sup> <sup>1201</sup> renown he died, probably from a poisoned cup which he had prepared for another.

The greater part of his reign was spent in campaigns outside Egypt, but he generally passed the winter months at Cairo, whilst his troops rested and rains or snow hindered marching, and he devoted these intervals to improving the country and the capital. It was not only in founding and restoring mosques and colleges, or rebuilding the Hall of Justice at the foot of the citadel, that he showed his public interest. He enlarged the irrigation canals and dug new ones, made roads and bridges, fortified Alexandria and repaired the pharos, and protected the mouths of the Nile from the risk of foreign invasion. He revived the Egyptian fleet, built forty war galleys, and maintained 12,000 regular troops—not reckoning, one must assume, the Arab and Egyptian militia or occasional levies. His heavy war expenses entailed heavy taxation, and though with a view to popularity he began his reign by remitting the oppressive taxes imposed by Kutuz to the amount of 600,000 D. a year, he found himself compelled to increase the fiscal burdens as his campaigns developed. Yet we read more often of old taxes repealed than of fresh duties imposed and his treasury was filled less by the imposts of Egypt than by the contributions from the conquered cities and districts of Syria, the tribute of vassal states and tribes, and the valuable custom-dues of the ports. Some idea of his wealth may be gained from the list of the presents he sent to his ally, the khan of the Golden Horde. There was a throne inlaid with carved ebony and ivory, a silver chest, choice prayer-carpets, curtains, cushions innumerable, fine sword-blades with silver hilts, saddles from Khwarizm, bows from Damascus, Arabian javelins, silver and enamelled lamps and chandeliers, a priceless Koran in a gold-embroidered case, black eunuchs, cooks, Arab horses, dromedaries, mules, wild asses, giraffes, apes, parrots, etc.

<sup>1</sup> Well, iv. 96-97. Karkis̄ya was taken from the Mongols in 1265; a year later the sheriff of Medina received his appointment from Beybars who also nominated the sheriff of Mekka. Hamāh was the last vestige of the Ayyubid power, and its princes retained their title of king, though really subordinate to the mamlūk sultans, until their extinction in 1341; the last king but one, Abi-l-Firdā, most famous as an historian and geographer, was born in 1273 at Damascus, whether his parents had fled in dread of a Mongol invasion. Hims (Famagusta) the penultimate possession of the Ayyubids, fell into Beybars's hands on the death of its last king in 1263. The rest of their dominions was taken by the Mongols about 1260, and the Syrian part was recovered by Kutuz. In 1263, Beybars had treacherously entrapped Maḡith, the Ayyubid prince of Karak, and probable claimant for the throne of his father 'Adil II of Egypt, and shut him up in the citadel of Cairo. Karak then became a fortress of Egypt, as Shawbek had been since 1261. Sawākin was taken in 1266.

His government was enlightened, just, and strict. He met the severe famine of 1264 by measures at once wise and generous, by regulating the sale of corn, and by undertaking, and compelling his officers and emirs to undertake the support of the destitute for three months. He allowed no wine (though the tax on it used to produce 6000 D. a year), beer, or hashish in his dominions; he attempted to eradicate contagious diseases by scientific isolation; he was strict with the morals of his subjects, shut up taverns and brothels, and banished the European women of the town; though, personally, he was addicted to the Tatar kumuz, and was suspected of oriental depravity. He was no sybarite, whatever his vices, no man was more full of energy and power of work. If his days were often given to hunting or polo, lance-play or marksmanship, his nights were devoted to business. A courier who arrived at daybreak received the answering despatches by the third hour, with invariably punctuality. We have seen (p. 247) how once fifty-six documents were drawn up, signed and sealed in one night.

With the people he was popular: the Muslims always admired a fighting sultan, especially if he had an open hand, and Beybars was lavish in largesse, as well as in alms. He was also approved by the religious, not only on account of his pious endowments, but because he showed no favour to any one party in Islam. For the first time he appointed four hajis, one for each of the four orthodox schools, and, by playing off one against another, contrived to get his own way in everything affecting law and religion. The nobles and officers of the state and army stood in dread of his wrath. He suspected every one, and constantly shifted his governors from post to post to prevent their acquiring local influence. If an emir showed a trace of treason there was no mercy for him; on the other hand, a loyal servant was sure of good pay, rapid promotion, and a share of the conquered lands. The sultan's worst quality was his perfidy; his word and his oath were worthless, and he prided himself upon tricking an enemy to his death. The insidious device by which he got rid of an Armenian ecclesiastic, by sending him a compromising letter and causing it to be waylaid by an Egyptian agent and shown to the Mongol governor, is but one of many instances. But it is fair to remember that he only met like with like, and that the court in which he was trained, supplemented by the experience of his own career, was not such as to encourage boundless confidence in his comrades or servants. By such steps as he had climbed, others might climb too, and it is not surprising that suspicion kept his dungeons in the Citadel constantly full. His mistrust of his agents led to various devices in order to watch them unseen; he was supposed to be confined to his tent by illness in Palestine when he had really ridden incognito all the way to Cairo,<sup>1</sup> where he stayed several days concealed in the Citadel, studying the behaviour of his unsuspecting representatives. On another occasion he is said to have ventured in disguise into Asia Minor to spy out the land, and having left a ring in pledge at a cook-shop, he had the effrontery to write to the Mongol Ilkhān Abāgā to request that it might be returned. His courage and daring, whether in battle or in dangerous exploration, were extraordinary. The heroic qualities of sultan Beybars have outlived his faults and pettinesses, and to the present century the audiences in the coffee-shops<sup>1</sup> of Cairo have delighted in the story-tellers' recital of the daring exploits and princely generosity of the king who has impressed the imagination of the Egyptians more than any other, scarcely excepting Alexander and Saladin.

<sup>1</sup> See the account of the romance of Es Zāhir (Fīl Phāher) in Late Modern Egyptians, ch. xxi.

CHAPTER X

THE HOUSE OF KALĀ'ĪN

1270—1382

Authorities.—Abd-l-Fattah, *en-Nuwayrī, Ibn Butāra, al-Makrizī, An-niṣāb-al-Malāyīn, al-Kakkashīnī, Ibrāhīm; modern: Guérin's Histoire des Sultans Mamelouks et des rois de l'Egypte, Weil, Geschichte der Chalifen, iv.; Lane-Poole, Art of the Saracens and Cat. Or. Coins in BM; Casanova, Hist. de la citadelle du Caire (Mém. hist. archéol. franç. vi.).*

Principal Monuments in Egypt.—Mosque, mīrābūn, and kubba (mosques) Kalā'īn, 1284—1303; Mosque émir Beybars; tomb Khalil, in south Karāk, 1285; La, in's restoration M. of Ibn-Tulun, 1296. T. Zeyn-ed-din Yūsuf, 1298; Medr. en-Nāṣir, 1300; restorations M. of el-Hākim, Azhar, Ibn-Kurik etc., 1302—4; Khanakah Beybars II, 1310. Medr. Taybars (in Azhar), 1309, aqueduct and buildings in Citadel, 1313, and M. en-Nāṣir, 1318; M. emir Ḥoseyn, 1319; M. Āl-mehk, 1319; Medr. Sengar el-Gawwāt and Salār, 1323. T. princess Ordutegün, 1324; M. Abū'l-Mu'minidhār, 1325; part of M. Kawqūn, 1329; M. Almūn, 1330; Medr. Al-kubrā, 1334; T. of Tukhtamur, 1334; palace Bourzak, c. 1335; T. and M. Alqānibugħā el-Māndānī, 1338—9; M. Sittat Miskīn, 1339; M. Aghlām, 1346; M. Kugħuk, 1346; M. Alquqħur, 1347; M. Arghān el-Isma'īlī, 1348. M. Kadlubugħā, 1348; M. Mangak, 1350. M., khānakhāh, and zekka Sheykhū, 1350—5; eastern of Lāqīn, 1351. M. Saqqurimish, 1357; M. and T. sultan Hāman, 1356—62; restorations M. el-Hākim, 1359, and Azhar, 1360; Medr. princess Tawār el-Nigariya, 1360; T. princess Tūlbīya, 1364. T. Tinkis, 1363; Medr. el-Qā'a el-Baġħi, 1373; M. el-Ashraf Sha'hā, 1368.

Principal Inscriptions in Egypt.—On the mosques and tombs enumerated above, often with dates of commencement as well as of completion; Baraka Kahn in mosque (disappeared), 1278; Behumer in M. of Talār, 1300; Beybars II in M. Hākim, 1303; Nāṣir on Citadel, 1313, and in M. Kalā'īn, 1303.

Principal Inscriptions in Syria.—Baraka (associated as prince with his father Beybars) on citadel of Damascus, and castle of Karak. Kallān on mausoleum built by him for Beybars and Baraka at Damascus, tablet commemorating conquest of Mirkab 1285, inscr. at Balqūnī, Ba'labbāk, Kank, Jerusalem, Hebron, Nibulus, and Sheyar; Khalil al-Yabā, on mosque at Tripolis, citadel of Aleppo; Ketbūghī on great mosque (church) of Ramla, and Hama; Lāgīl on great mosque (church) of Gaza, at Shāwīsh and Nūrikhīr; Nāṣir Muhammād in harem of Jerusalem, M. el-Aksā, k. es-Sakhrā etc., in mosques of Gaza, G'ebelī, Tripolis, Ramla, on tower of Ramla, wall and gate of Damascus, and Qāt Tārī near by, on castle of Karak, at Latakia and on M. Hor; Kāim I Shā'bān in M. el-Aksā at Jerusalem, on castles of Kank and Tripolis; Hasan in M. el-Aksā and in great mosque of Ba'albeck, es-Sādī in M. el-Aksā and mosque at Ma'a near Karak; Nāṣir Shā'bān on citadel of Aleppo (M.S. notes of M. van Berchem).

Cards (see under each reign), armorial badges, numerous bowls and other vessels, enamelled glass lamps, etc. in British, Victoria and Albert, Cairo, Paris, and other museums, and in private collections.

Of the three sons of Beybars, the eldest, by a daughter of Baraka Khan of the Golden Horde, was raised to the throne with the titles el-Melik es-Sādī Nāṣir-ed-din Baraka Khan. Beybars had proclaimed him his heir as early as 1264, and three years later had caused him to be saluted as "sultan," so anxious was he to secure the dynastic succession to his line. Unhappily he had not transmitted his great qualities to his sons. Es-Sādī was a weak pleasure loving youth of nineteen, the tool of his Mongolian mother and of the gay young courtiers of his choice, upon whom he lavished the best appointments of the empire. The old emirs of his father's wars were neglected; some were imprisoned, or even poisoned by the queen-mother; their discontent grew into open rebellion, and Sādī, besieged in the citadel of Cairo, was forced to abdicate, and to retire to the fortress of Karak.<sup>1</sup> The māmūka begged Kālā'īn, one of the most capable of the elder generals, to accept the throne; but the prudent emir foresaw opposition, and preferred to set up the youngest son of his master, Bedr-ed-din Selāmish with the title of el-'Adil. For a hundred days Kālā'īn acted as atibeg or regent for the child of seven years, meanwhile placing his own supporters in all the offices of state, and thus preparing the way for the next step. Selamish was then quietly deposed, and Kala'ün became sultan of Egypt.

<sup>1</sup> He died in March, 1280, and was buried beside Beybars at Damascus. His brother, el-Nas'ūd Khājīr, succeeded him as prince of Karak.

El-Melik el-Manṣur Seyf-ed-din Kala'ün el-Efi Ḫilbi,<sup>1</sup> a Turk of the Burg Oghlu tribe of Kipchak, more fortunate in his progeny than Beybars, founded a princely house which lasted a hundred years, maintained and even increased the prestige and territorial extent of the Egyptian empire, and filled the capital with noble monuments. He had, however, a stern fight to go through before he was settled on his throne. The mamluk system had this special weakness, that on the death of the sultan, whom they had elected from their number, the leading emirs were all possible candidates for the vacant place. There was as yet no hereditary order of succession, though the tendency had been to prefer—pending party combinations—the temporary recognition of a late sultan's son. There were several of Beybars's generals who felt that they had as good a claim to the throne as Kala'ün, and one of them, Sunkur, proclaimed himself king of Syria with the style of el-Melik el-Kāmil.<sup>2</sup> He had the support of several of the leading Zihiris or mamluks of Beybars, together with that of the Bedawis of the desert, and the Ayyūbid prince of Hamāh. Their united forces were defeated by Kala'ün only after a long combat of many hours, aided by defections; in a great battle at el Gesura, near Damascus; and partly by discriminating severity partly by wise conciliation, the disaffection was brought to an end. Soon after, he renewed the truce which Beybars had made with the Hospitallers of Markab (in spite of their infractions), and concluded treaties with the prince of Tripoli (16 July, 1281), the Templars of Tortosa (15 April, 1282) and the lord of Akka (3 June, 1283). These treaties were nominally for ten years, and the most notable provisions they contained were freedom of access for Egyptian vessels to the Christian ports, and ominous restrictions upon further fortifications. That the Christian states agreed to abandon measures of self-defence is evidence that they must have felt their helplessness against the armies of Egypt. Their end was not far off.

<sup>1</sup> "The victorious king sword of the faith, Kala'ün the millitary, [mamluk] of el Ḫilb." Kala'ün, so pronounced in Egypt, but written Kilawün in Turkish, means "duck", and the representation of a wild duck is very common upon bowls and other works in inland silver and brass bearing his name or his sons'. See my Art of the Saracens, pp. 164, 190, 194. The "millitary" refers to his having been purchased for a thousand dinars. He was a thorough Turk, and spoke very little Arabic. Very few of Kala'ün's coins have been preserved; one has a date, Damascus, 682 (1283-4).

These various treaties with the Crusader cities were concluded under the stress of a Mongol invasion. Kaiwan wanted his hands free to engage his only formidable enemy, who, taking advantage of the confusion of the Syrian revolt, had crossed the Euphrates, and sacked Aleppo. The sultan raised every man he could, mamlûks and Turkmâns, troops from Hamâh and Karak, Bedawis of the deserts, and Arabs from the Hîgâz and from the Euphrates.<sup>1</sup> His total muster was about 50,000. The Mongols under Mangatimur, a brother of the Ilkhan Abâghâ, numbered according to different estimates from 50,000 to 80,000, of whom about a third were composed of contingents from Georgia, Armenia, and the East Roman borders. The two armies met near Hîmâ, and the decisive battle was fought on Thursday, 30 Oct., 1281. The bewildering tactics of the Mongol horsemen, who doubtless employed their famous tusughwa or turning movement, completely broke the Muslim left, which fled helter-skelter to the gates of Hîmâ, hotly pursued by the swift archers of the steppes. Some of the Egyptians were there slaughtered, some continued their flight towards Egypt, bearing lamentable tidings of the sultan's defeat; whilst the victorious pursuers bivouacked outside Hîmâ, and feasted upon their spoils. It occurred to neither party that what had happened to the Egyptian left might not have happened to the right and centre. The steady old troops of the Ayyūbid prince of Hamāh were stationed here, with the active and elusive Bedawis, and these had not only stood the brunt of the Mongols' attack, and put their left to flight, but had wounded their general, and taking them in the moment of leaderless hesitation, had charged home and driven the enemy to utter rout. Just as the Mongol right had chased the Egyptian left, so did the Egyptian right pursue the Mongol left, and the extraordinary spectacle of the two halves of two large armies vehemently hunting each other in opposite directions was exhibited to the amazed sultan of Egypt, as, with a guard of only a thousand mamlūks, he stood deserted upon a hill! The scathing Mongols, however, soon learned the disaster to their left, and hastened to join their retreating comrades. They were in such a hurry that they did not even turn aside to cut up the sultan's small brigade, though they passed so close to him that he anxiously concealed his banners and silenced his drums. As soon as he saw their backs, however, he fell upon them, harassed their retreat, and sent orders by pigeon to his governors at the Euphrates to bar the fords. It was the worst disaster the Mongols had met with in their attempts upon Syria: Kūtuz, Beybars, and now Kālā'ūn had defeated them, and the greatest defeat was the last.

<sup>1</sup> Makrîzî describes the contingent of 4000 Arabs of the tribe of Mura as all well mounted, armed with helmet and cuirass covered with silk, carrying sword and lance, and accompanied by a dâimî, who sang a war-song.

<sup>141</sup> The result was an armed truce for seventeen years. Both Mangutimur and Abagha died in the following spring, and the next Ilkhān of Persia, Ahmad, was a Mongol converted to Islam. He did not on that account renounce the policy of his predecessors, and the correspondence with Kālā'ūn exchanged through his ambassador hinted not obscurely at war; but a rival in his own country mended his manners, and a second embassy brought handsome presents and friendly assurances. The ambassadors were received at Damascus by Kālā'ūn, who was surrounded by a guard of 1500 mamlūks, dressed in red atlas satin, with golden girdles, and turbans of cloth of gold, each holding a wax candle. But at this moment Ahmad was dead, and the sultan of Egypt had no further trouble with the Mongols for the rest of his reign. With the rival Mongol of the Golden Horde he preserved the amicable relations established by Beybars, and also with the emperor of Constantinople, the kings of France, and Castile, and Sicily, the republic of Genoa, and the emperor Rudolf of Habsburg. With Genoa he concluded a commercial treaty, whilst Alfonso of Castile and James of Sicily actually made a defensive alliance with the Muslim sultan against all comers (1250). The king of the Yemen sent him costly presents, and even the ruler of Ceylon despatched an embassy with a letter which no one at Cairo could read, and with a more intelligible oral communication inviting trade with his rich country and offering the aid of twenty ships. Kultuūn, like Beybars, was a far-sighted statesman, and did his utmost to attract merchants to Egypt. His passports, ensuring protection throughout his dominions to foreign traders, were current as far as India and China.

When the fear of the Mongols had abated, the sultan lost no time in reducing the Crusader cities. His treaties<sup>1</sup> were valid only so long as he found them convenient, and his oath was no more sacred than that of Beybars. In spite of his ten years' engagement with the Hospitallers, he suddenly fell upon their great fortress of Markab, which was totally unprepared for a siege, and surrendered. The count of Tripoli was then forced to yield him Marakiya on the coast, though its position defied a siege by land. Margaret of Tyre purchased peace for ten years (on paper) by surrendering <sup>Aug.</sup> half her revenues and engaging never to renew her fortifications. The kingdom of Little Armenia was raided and compelled to buy a ten years' truce by a tribute of 1,000,000 dirhems yearly, to release all Muslim prisoners, and also to desist from all measures of defence. In defiance of the treaty with Tripoli, Latakia was seized; and after the death of Boemond VII—the death of a signatory was then held to void a treaty—

<sup>1</sup> Some of these documents are printed in Arabic, with French translation, in the appendix to Quatremère's Mahrif, II., L. 266 ff.

<sup>124</sup> Tripoli itself was besieged, sacked, and stormed, the men put to the sword, the women and children enslaved, and the city burnt. Finally, the people of 'Akka having broken the truce, and any pretext being welcome, a Holy War was proclaimed, and the sultan had just set <sup>125</sup> forth to its conquest, when he suddenly died in his tent <sup>Nov.</sup> <sup>12</sup> at the age of seventy.

Kala'un followed closely in the steps of Baybars. Their circumstances were identical, and he had confronted the same difficulties with the same policy, fortifying himself by foreign and commercial alliances, temporizing with minor enemies near at hand, in order to meet the one real danger, the Mongol invasion, with his full strength. He had fully maintained the prestige and extent of the empire, and though two expeditions into Nubia (1287-1289)<sup>1</sup> had not succeeded in suppressing a contumacious king, Shemamun had at least been so far impressed by the repeated and temporarily successful invasions of the Egyptians, that he renewed the annual Aqiq, or tribute which he had rashly renounced. The army was kept in a high state of efficiency, and never before had the 12,000 mamlūks been so strictly disciplined and restrained from their natural excesses. About a third of these were quartered in the citadel of Cairo, and this brigade was known as "the Burgīs" (men of the Burg or tower). Many of them were Circassians, or Mongols from the Golden Horde. Kala'un is extolled by his eastern contemporaries as a king at once brave and prescient, just and mild, who abhorred bloodshed; yet he could be stern and severe to disloyal emirs, many of whom were executed, imprisoned, or despoiled, whilst his punishments were sometimes barbarous. A Christian who had married a Muslim, contrary to the law, was burnt, and his wife was disfigured. Against Christians, whether on the Syrian coast or in the Egyptian chanceries, he was prejudiced, and by the end of his reign they were excluded from all government offices. Towards his Muslim subjects he was benevolent, and his chief pious foundation was devoted as much to the physical as to the spiritual well-being of the people. When Kalā'ūn was lying seriously ill in Nūr-ed-din's hospital at Damascus he made a vow that if he recovered he would build a hospital at Cairo. The result was the well known Māristān completed in 1284. The buildings are really three, a mosque, a hospital, and the founder's tomb-chapel (medfən). The tomb-chapel is decorated with wonderful arabesque tracery and reliefs in plaster, and with fine marble mosaic; and the red granite pillars, and the robes of the sultan and his son here preserved, have been touched by sick people, barren wives, and dumb children for centuries in a belief in their curative virtues. The mosque is less striking, but the hospital is one of the most remarkable buildings in Cairo. It contains three courts, two of which are surrounded by small cells, whilst from a larger court with a colonnade on each side open a number of rooms. There were originally wards for every known disease, and a regular medical staff, lecture room, laboratories, dispensary, baths, kitchens, and every appliance then understood. Musica is soothed the wakeful hours of the sufferers, whilst in the adjoining mosque fifty salaried readers of the Koran taught the consolations of religion, and a librarian with five assistants presided over a fine collection of medical, theological, and legal books. Sixty orphans were maintained and educated in the neighbouring school. The hospital was the first ever built in Cairo, and its value was immediately appreciated. Rich and poor were alike treated gratuitously, and this great work has made the name of Kala Un blessed among sultans in Egypt, for with Muslim charity covers a multitude of sins.'

<sup>1</sup> For the various Egyptian campaigns in Nubia and the Sūdān, which cannot be fully narrated here, see Quatremère's Mémoires géographiques et historiques sur l'Egypte, etc., II. 39-126.

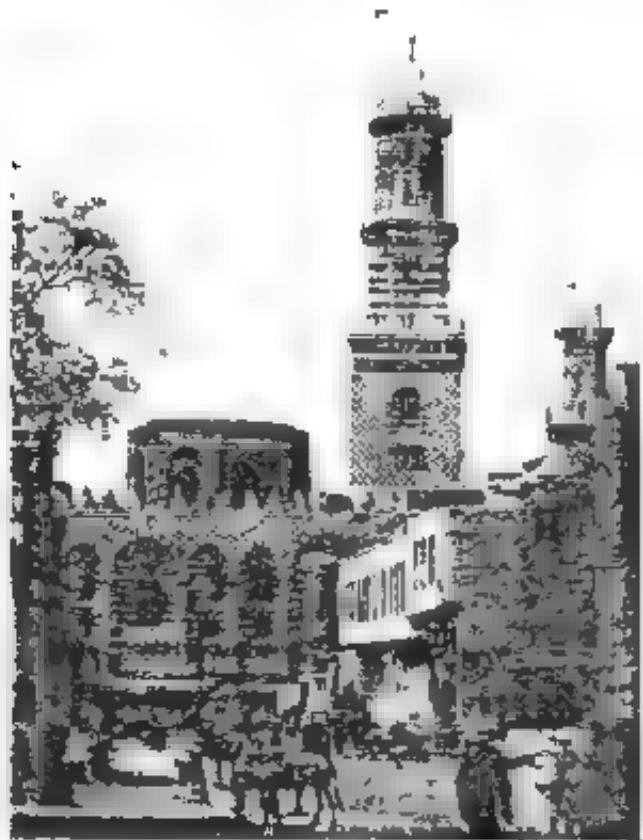

Fig. 60.—Tomb-mosque of Kalā'ūn, 1284.

Of the four sons of Kali-an, 'Ali-ed-din had been declared his successor in 1280, but when he died mysteriously in 1288, the next son Khalil was appointed heir, though his father, whether from dislike of his violent and godless character, or because he suspected him of poisoning his brother, could never be induced to sign the formal deed of appointment. "I will not give the Muslims," he said, "a king like Khalil." He was waiting probably for the younger son Muhammad to grow up. But meanwhile Kali-an's death and the public recognition did what the unsigned diploma intended. Without opposition el-Mehk el-Ashraf Salib-ed-din Khalil<sup>1</sup> sat on his father's throne. From the first he set himself to humiliate or get rid of the trusted henchmen of his father's court and army. His brief reign of three years is full of execution, imprisonment, and spoliation of the great emirs. The highest ministers of state were the first to suffer. Turuntā, the chief wezir, was cut down before the sultan's eyes, and Lāgīn only escaped death before the throne because the bowstring snapped at his wind-pipe, and the emirs begged him off. The confiscation of Turuntā's goods brought the sultan 600,000 D., in gold, 17,000 lb. of silver coins, and countless slaves, horses, and jewels; whilst the blind son of the murdered man was reduced to beg his bread.

<sup>1</sup> For the condition and use of the Nâzâra early in the present century, see Lane, Cairo Fifty Years Ago, 92 ff., and for the architecture and ornament consult my Art of the Saracens, 73—5, 91, 101, 123 ff.

<sup>2</sup> Coins of Khalil are known with the dates, Cairo, 691 (A.D. 1292); Alexandria, 692.

Khalil, at the age of twenty-seven, combined in a superlative degree the worst vices of a cruel and capricious tyrant. His one virtue was courage, and his one exploit the conquest of 'Akka. Although the campaign was the legacy of his hated father, he was eager to carry out the policy of extirpating the "infidels"; and little as he cared for religion, he had enough superstition to preface every campaign by a solemn service of prayer and Korān-reading under the beautiful dome of his father's tomb. The Syrian officials were ordered to send their troops to the plain of 'Akka, together with such quantities of siege material and machines that they filled a hundred ox-carts. Khalil with the army of Egypt joined the camp on April 5, and in a week,<sup>1212</sup> <sup>Apr.</sup> ninety-two siege engines were playing upon the walls and outworks. 'Akka had the reputation, dating from Saladin's time, of the most formidable fortified place in Syria, and Khalil had brought together an unusually heavy siege train. The defence, however, was not what it had been in former and better days. The fall of so many Christian cities in the campaigns of Beybars and Kulaūn had filled 'Akka with a dangerously mixed and

Fig. 61.—Dinar of Khalil, Cairo, date effaced.

CONQUEST OF AKKA

demoralized population, the offscourings of the refuse of Europe.

"Within its walls were gathered representatives from every nation in Christendom. For every one there was a separate commune, and the various lords of the land, the masters of the great orders, the representatives of the kings of France, England, and Jerusalem, each exercised separate authority; so that there were in one city seventeen independent powers, 'whence there sprang much confusion.' It is not strange that in such circumstances the city became, as it were, the sink into which all the vileness of Christendom found its way. Over its mixed population many ruled but none had authority; within its walls the precepts of religion, law, and morality were alike void, so that in its last days Akka became a byword in all Christian lands for the luxury, turbulence, and vice of its inhabitants. . . . There were not wanting enough soldiers to have successfully defended the city; but even in this the last hour of their extremity, its inhabitants were more intent upon feasting than upon fighting. Cowardice and discord also played their part in ruining the hopes of a successful defence. Many at the first threat of danger made haste to flee over-sea, whilst others who stayed for a time departed when the prospects of success grew desperate. . . . Not even when the whole purpose of their existence was in peril could the Templars and Hospitallers lay aside their mutual jealousy; and so the defence, if conducted with valour in parts, lacked that general unity of purpose which could alone have made it successful. At length on Friday, May 18, Khali's engines had wrought such a breach in the walls that, the moat being filled with stones and bodies of the dead, his army forced its way into the city. The people fled before him to the towers, the palaces of the nobles, or the great house of the Templars. Others, making their way to the harbour, crowded on board the ships in such numbers that some vessels were swamped as they lay at anchor. Henry II of Cyprus, who had played a not unworthy part in the early days of the siege, had already escaped to his island kingdom, whither the grand master of the Hospital and a number of other fugitives now followed him. But there yet remained 60,000 Christians whose fate was slavery, or the sword, or worse. The Templars and those who had taken refuge with them met the noble end; for, resorting to the last, they succumbed only when their fortress was undermined, and together with numbers of their assailants perished in its ruins."<sup>1</sup>

So the last stronghold of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem was stormed, sacked, and given to the flames; its renowned towers and bastions were thrown down, its fortifications razed to the earth; and, though a new town rose in its place, the 'Akka of the Middle Ages, the city of a valiant century of fighting, vanished for ever. With its fall the last remnant of the crusading dominions disappeared; for when 'Akka was lost, Tyre, Sidon, Beyrūt, and the few remaining cities of the Franks could only succumb to fate. Some were taken, some surrendered, but all, save Beyrūt, were demolished, their inhabitants massacred or enslaved, and the name of Crusader wiped clean out of the land. The "debate of the world" was closed.

Khalil entered Damascus with a multitude of captives, and a brave display of Christian skulls upon his spear-heads. His success heightened his resolve. He extracted the old caliph Hākim from his quiet retreat in the Citadel of Cairo, and made him thrice preach a Holy War in the mosque. He had another solemn service at the tomb of his father. He marched to the Euphrates,<sup>1000</sup> besieged and took the "fortress of the Greeks,"<sup>1000</sup> <sup>Java</sup> Kal'at-er-Rūm, and renamed it Kal'at-el-Muslīmīn. He announced that he was about to conquer the whole of Asia and the land of the Romans, till his rule should be supreme from the dawn to the sunset; and then he went home to Cairo. He proclaimed a conquest of the <sup>1000</sup> Yemen, and then a campaign in Armenia, but it ended at Damascus, where the prudent Cilician surrendered Mar'ash and Behesna in order to keep the peace. The Iikhān of Persia sent an envoy to say that he wished to live at Aleppo, which had once been taken by his father, and to request its surrender; Khalil replied that he had similar views about Baghdad, which had belonged to his caliphs, and they would see which would get to his goal first. This idle boasting came to an abrupt end <sup>Dec.</sup> when Khalil was lured into a shooting party and <sup>1291</sup> murdered by some of his disgusted emirs. When the chief regicide was caught no less a personage than Beydara, the prime minister of Egypt—before his execution he addressed the assembled emirs in justification of his act. "A man," he said, "like Khalil, who drinks wine in the month of fasting, who is given over to unnatural vice, who turns his slaves into nobles, and angries the old emirs of his father, throws some into chains and puts others to the sword, is not fit to rule over Muslims."

<sup>1</sup> Archer and Kingsford, The Crusades, 414—418.

The next half century of mamlūk history is occupied by the three interrupted reigns of Salāḥūn's surviving son (by the Mongol princess Aslān Khattun) el-Melik en-Nāṣir Nāṣir-ed-din Mohammad, who was set up by the leading emirs, at the age of nine, after his brother's death; was deposed in a year; brought back five years later (1298); retired again after ten years; and when a year more had passed came back for the third time in 1309, and retained the throne for thirty years till his death (1340). His repeated restoration was due less to any principle of hereditary right—though respect for the memory of his father inclined people to his descendants—than to the jealousies of the leading emirs, which rendered any choice of a sultan from among them little better than an incentive to civil war and murder. En-Nāṣir's first reign was of course purely nominal. The real power lay in the hands of the great nobles who divided the high offices of state among themselves. Ketbugha was viceroy (wālid-al-mālikā), Sengar <sup>el-</sup> Shugāl was wazir, Beybars the Taster (idshāqīr) was master of the household. The new government at first displayed virtuous energy in capturing the regicides, and avenged Khalil's murder upon such as they caught by horrible forms of death. A favourite torment was to nail the criminal to boards and parade him through the streets on a camel till he died of thirst and agony. Like all such military cliques, the party soon split up into jealous factions, one supporting Ketbugha, the other Shugilt. Street fights ensued, and at last Shugilt was closely besieged in the citadel by an angry mob demanding his head. He was at length betrayed by en-Nasir's Mongolian mother, who sympathized with her fellow countryman Ketbugha outside the walls. The head of Shugilt was paraded on a pike, and the populace protested their undying loyalty to the royal house.

Ketbugha was now virtually sultan, and his name was prayed for on Fridays next to en-Nasir's. To strengthen his position he obtained pardon for the two leading regicides—Lagin and Karisunkur, who enjoyed large popularity and had a strong following—with whom he began to scheme for the possession of the throne. His favour to these emirs roused the indignation of the Ashrafs, or mamâks of the murdered Ashraf Khalil, 700 in number, who rose in revolt, seized the royal stables and the armourers' market, and after plundering and destroying whatever lay to their hands, encamped at the Citadel gate and laid siege to the fortress. Ketbugha's troops mounted and rode down to disperse them, and after their defeat the rebels were given over to sundry forms of torture, blinded, maimed, drowned, beheaded and hanged, or nailed to the city gate Zawila; and only a few were so far spared that they were allotted as slaves to their conquerors. Thus the rebellion was put down; but the next day, the viceroy, calling a council of the great nobles of the court, protested that such exhibitions were dishonourable to the kingly state, and that the dignity of sultan would be irreparably compromised if a child like en-Nasir were any longer suffered to occupy the throne. The child <sup>1364</sup> <sup>Dec.</sup> was therefore sent away to grow up, and Ketbugha, as a matter of course, succeeded. He was unlucky in being associated in the people's mind with a great famine and a terrible plague, when 700 corpses were borne out of a single gate of Cairo in one day, and 17,500 deaths were recorded in a month. These calamities, added to the discontent excited by the new sultan's favouritism towards the Mongol officers, led to a conspiracy. At the end of 1206 on his return from a journey to Syria, his tent was attacked; his guards and mamlūks, by a devoted resistance, succeeded in enabling their master to fly; and the leader of the rebellion, the new viceroy Lāgin, was forthwith chosen sultan in his stead.

Husāni-ed-dīn Lāgin el-Mansūri,<sup>1</sup> who now ascended the throne under the title of el-Mansur, had originally been a slave of el-Mansūr 'Alī,<sup>2</sup> son of Aybek, and had then been bought for about £30 by Kalaūn, under whom he rose from the grade of page to that of silahdar, or armour-bearer; and Kalaūn, coming to the throne, gave him the rank of emir, and made him viceroy of Syria. Khalil sent Lāgin into prison, and in return Lāgin assisted in his murder. During the brief reign of Ketbughā, he held the highest office as viceroy, and now he had turned against his latest lord, and had seized the crown for himself. He had at least some claim of connexion with the royal family (if any hereditary principle was then acknowledged), for he had married a daughter of Kalaūn. The terms of his election throw an interesting light upon the precarious authority of the mamlūk sultans. His fellow-conspirators marched at his stirrup, hailed him sultan, and paid him homage; but they exacted as a condition of their fealty that the new monarch should continue as one of themselves, do nothing without their advice, and never show undue favour towards his own mamlûks. This he swore ; but so suspicious were they of his good faith, that they made him swear it again, openly hinting that when he was once instated he would break his vow and favour his own followers to the injury of the nobles who had raised him to the throne. <sup>1364</sup> Dec.,

<sup>1</sup> The few coins preserved of Ketbughā and Lāgin generally have their dates effaced by wear, but one of Ketbughā has, the date [69]4 (1294-5).

<sup>2</sup> The European idea that Lāgin was a German is not confirmed by any Arabic authority, and is probably baseless.

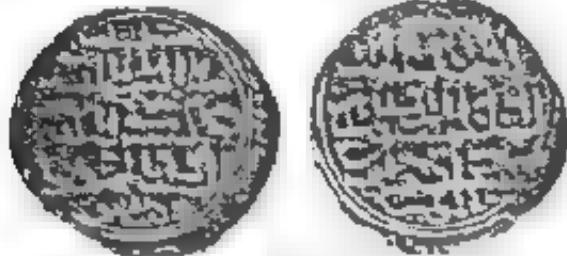

Fig. 62.—Dinar of Ketbugha, Cairo (1294-95).

When this had been satisfactorily arranged, Lâgin rode on to Cairo, attended by the insignia of sovereignty, with the royal parasol borne over his head by the great lord Beyzan ; the prayers were said in his name in the mosques, drums were beaten in the towns he passed through ; the nobles of Cairo came out to do him fealty ; and, excited by a crowd of lords and officers, he rode to the Citadel, displayed himself as sultan to the people in the mejdan, and made his royal progress through the streets from the Citadel to the gate of Victory. The 'Abbasid caliph, a feeble relic of the ancient house of Bagdad, rode at his side ; and before them was carried the caliph's diploma of investiture, without which no sultan would have considered his coronation complete. The streets were decorated with precious silks and arms, and great was the popular rejoicing ; for the benevolence and generosity of Lâgin made him a favourite with the people, and he had already promised to remit the balance of the year's taxes, and had even vowed that if he lived there should not be a single tax left. The price of food, which had risen to famine height during the late disturbances, now fell sixty per cent ; bread was cheap, and the sultan was naturally adored.

In spite of his share in a royal murder and a treacherous usurpation, he seems to have earned the affection of his subjects. Not only did he relieve the people from much of the pressure of unjust and arbitrary taxation under which they had groaned, but he abstained, at least until he fell under the influence of another mind, from the tyrannical imprisonments and tortures by which the rule of the mamlûks was too commonly secured. His conduct to his rivals was clement to a degree hardly paralleled among the princes of his time. He did not attempt to destroy the ex-sultan Ketbugha, but gave him the government of Sakkad by way of compensation.<sup>1</sup> The child Nāṣir had nothing to fear from Lāgīn, who told him that, as his father's mamluk, he only regarded himself as his representative, holding the throne until Nāṣir should be old enough to reign himself. Lāgīn was zealous in good works, gave alms largely in secret, and founded many charitable endowments. His restoration of the mosque of Ibrāhīm Tūlūn, at a cost of £10,000, was impelled by the circumstance that he had found refuge in the then deserted cloisters during the pursuit which followed the murder of Khālid. Hidden in the neglected chambers and arcades of the old mosque, with so few worshippers repaired that but a single lamp was lighted before the niche at night, and the small children daigned to come no further than the threshold to escort the caliph to prayer, Lāgīn vowed that he would repair his preservation by repairing the mosque that had sheltered him. Such good deeds, and the magnanimous release of many prisoners, could not fail to endear him to the populace; and after he was confined to the Citadel for two months with injuries resulting from a fall at polo, the rejoicings on his return to public life were genuine and universal. All the streets were decorated with silks and satins, the shops and windows were hung by sight-seers eager to catch a glimpse of the sultan, and drums were beaten during his state progress through the capital. He celebrated the occasion by giving a number of robes of honour to the chief lords, freeing captives, and distributing alms to the poor. His private life commended him to the good Muslims of Cairo; for although in his youth he had been a wine-bibber, gambler, and too much absorbed in sport, when he ascended the throne he became austere in his practice, fasted two months in the year besides Ramadan, affected the society of good pious qādīs and divines, was plain in his dress, as the Prophet ordains that a Muslim should be, and strict in enforcing simplicity among his followers. His ruddy complexion and blue eyes, together with a tall and imposing figure, indeed marked the foreigner, but his habits were orthodoxy itself; he bastinadoed drunkards, even if they were nobles; and his immoderate eating was not necessarily wicked.

<sup>1</sup> Ketbugha lived to serve his old master's son, as-Nāṣir, loyally in his wars, received Cairo, and died in 1303, much respected for his high character and piety.

But Lāgin, in spite of his promise, began to make favourites. He had at first appointed his fellow-conspirators to the great offices of state; but gradually he began to replace the old emirs by new men, and a certain Mangūtimūr acquired a supreme and unhappy influence over his amiable sovereign. Tried and honoured nobles were tested on the proposal that the new viceroy should be Lāgin's successor, and on their indignant negation of the possibility of such a step, they were cast into prison, where they died with suspicious regularity. At last even the great lord Beysart, the richest and most popular emir in Egypt, was thus arrested, though the marshal led him to prison with tears in his eyes. Murmurs became louder, and to silence them Lāgin sent the army to ravage Little Armenia, and took the opportunity to disperse the Syrian nobles whom he distrusted. Some fled to the Mongols of Persia, and Syria was given over to anarchy. Egypt was scarcely less disturbed: Mangūtimūr's oppressions and reprisals were not tamely endured by the emirs; but it was no light thing to risk the horrors of incarceration in the Citadel dungeon, a noisome pit, where foul and deadly exhalations, unclean vermin, and bats, rendered the darkness more horrible. At length a plot was formed by two determined men : Ligin was murdered as he was in the act of rising to say the evening prayers, and immediately afterwards Mangutimur was entrapped. He was for the moment consigned to the pit under the Citadel; but the emir who had dealt the fatal stroke to Ligin arrived on the scene, and crying with a strident voice, "What had the sultan done that I should kill him? By God, I never had aught but benefits from him; he brought me up, and gave me my steps of promotion. Had I known that when the sultan was dead this Mangutimur would be living, I would never have done this murder, for it was this man's acts that led me to the deed." So saying, he plunged into the dungeon, slew the hated favourite with his own hands, and delivered his house over to the soldiers to pillage.

Fig. 61.—Inscription on medress (college) of en Nâur al Cairo, 1290.

The murderers, one of whom assumed the throne for a few days, were duly executed with that sense of justice which the mamlûks always displayed towards other people's crimes. But after this experience of the rule of an emir, the only course was to revert to the established line ; and en-Nâṣir was brought back to Cairo and welcomed with a burst of enthusiasm. Two days later he was again enthroned with a new diploma of investiture from the nominal caliph. Robes of honour were distributed, cities decorated, drums beaten throughout the empire. He was still only fourteen, and no match for the stern emirs who really governed. The new governors who now departed to their provincial posts, after kissing the threshold of the Citadel according to custom, were all creatures of the emirs Salîr and Beybars "the Taster" (gâshnegîr), the one a Uirat Tatar, the other a Circassian, who managed the affairs of state much to their own advantage. The caliph held councils on Saturdays, but all he had to do was to register the decisions of his emirs : Salar suggested a certain measure, and Nasir announced its sanction. Whilst the great nobles were amassing vast fortunes from their landed fiefs and various perquisites—Salar's daughter was given a dowry of 100,000 D—the sultan was kept almost in penury, and deprived of the delicacies and luxuries to which he was accustomed. The only question seemed to be which of the two leaders, Salar or Beybars, would overthrow the other and seize the throne. So far they were acting together, inseparable in public acts and ceremonies, but the duel must come before long.

<sup>1</sup> Coins of Nâṣir's second reign (1299—1310) bear the dates Cairo, 692 (which must be 698 or 699 = 1299—1300), and Cairo, 707 (1307-8). Many more coins bearing the name of Nâṣir, and the mints Cairo, Aleppo, Hasmâh, Tripolis, Damascus, may belong either to this or to the first or third reign.

Meanwhile every other consideration was merged in the renewed struggle with the Mongols. The Bahri mamluks, who had fled to Ghazan, one of the greatest and best of the Ilkhans of Persia, had fully revealed to him the distracted condition of Syria at the close of Lajin's reign, and with their counsel the Mongols again crossed the Euphrates in great strength to recover what they had lost in 1262. The young sultan, though no warrior, rode at the head of the army of Egypt to meet <sup>1262</sup>
<sub>Syria</sub> the invader, leaving the real command to the emirs, to whom war was as the breath of life. Bad fortune attended the march from the outset. The emirs were jealous and quarrelsome ; a conspiracy of Viral refugees of Syria against the Egyptian leaders, though savagely suppressed, bred under suspicions ; much of the camp baggage was lost in the flooded torrents ; a dense flight of swallows, an evil omen, darkened the sky—the army was dismayed. Then as they neared Damascus crowds of fugitives from Aleppo and the north testified to the terror of the invasion. Still advancing, but with sinking hearts, the Egyptians came in sight of the Mongols at Himp. "Throw away your lances," was the order, "and trust to sword and mace." The only chance lay in close fighting, eye to eye, when the Mongol bowmen could not use their arrows. In the "Ghill of the Treasurer" (Waqi'-el-Khāqāndī) 20,000 or so of mamluk

Dec. 23 horsemen met a Mongol army estimated at four or five times their number. But all the great emirs were there, mighty men of war and the troopers were heavily armed and bound by clannish ties to their leaders. The usual formation in three divisions, centre and right and left wing, was observed, and a body of 200 grenadiers armed with naphtha tubes was placed in front of the line. Holy divines went up and down the ranks, exhorting the men not to waver, till the soldiers wept in self-compassion! Ghazan kept his Mongols dismounted, behind their horses, and threw the first move upon the Egyptians. The naphtha was discharged, without effect, and then the Mongols abandoned their reserve, and after pouring a deadly volley of arrows into the advancing Egyptians, mounted and charged with their usual dash. As at the earlier battle of Hims, each side scored a success on opposite wings, and for a moment the issue wavered. Then Ghazan, stemming his fears, rallied his men to a second charge, which broke the centre, and the splendid cavalry of Egypt turned and fled. The great emirs, Salar, Bekumir, Burlighi, all were riding for their lives, with the arrows of their pursuers hissing past their ears. The weeping sultan was left with eighteen mamlūks for his guard. He was saved by the Egyptian left, who had been successful at the outset of the battle, and coming back from the pursuit of their opponents were amazed to find the day lost and the king abandoned. Their arrival, coupled with the heavy loss of the Mongols, checked the rout and the remnant of the army retreated in fair order to Damascus, and thence with the utmost speed to Egypt.

13 The Mongols immediately occupied Damascus without resistance, and to his credit, Ghazan, who was a Muslim, and also a wise and generous king, showed the utmost clemency to the inhabitants, not only of his own religion, but Jews and Christians as well. No pillage or annoyance was to be permitted. The community of religion naturally distinguished this conquest from the earlier invasions when the Mongols were still heathen, but there was a good deal of the old leaven among them, they were hard to hold, and outside Damascus they committed much havoc. Even inside a vast amount of injury was done, nearly 10,000 inhabitants were killed or sold, and many precious monuments of the age of Nür-ed-din burnt and destroyed; but this breach of faith must be ascribed less to Mongol perfidy than to the impossibility of restraining a barbarous army, and to the inevitable destruction caused by the valorous defence of the citadel, which Argawash, the Egyptian commandant, resolutely refused to surrender, and whence he waged a vigorous contest with the city. Meanwhile Egypt was strenuously working for revenge. Immense preparations in arms and money were made. The demand for mounts was so great that the price of a horse rose from £ 12 to £ 40; and gold was so plentiful that the dinar fell to the exchange value of seventeen instead of twenty-five dirhems. In view of these preparations, and of danger on the eastern frontier, and finding the citadel impregnable, the Mongols evacuated Damascus, after an orgy of drunk and debauchery such as had never before been known in that home of orthodoxy.

<sup>1</sup> The decree of capitulation (from Neweyri) is printed in Quatremère's Makrī II., ii. 251, note, and the subsequent firman constituting the new government of Syria, ibid. 256, note; see also Howorth, Hist. of the Mongols, iii. 441 ff.

The Bahri mamlüks who had accompanied Ghazán were left in command, and reverted to their Egyptian allegiance. Argawash came down from the citadel he had so valiantly defended, restored order, repressed rioting, poured out the Mongols' wine and broke their bottles. The Egyptians reoccupied Damascus and Aleppo and the whole of <sup>Apr.</sup> Syria; and the Druses of the Lebanon, whose 12,000 bowmen had harassed the mamlüks in their retreat four months before, were brought to a heavy reckoning.

Negotiations followed: after a disastrous expedition into north Syria, where rains and snow decimated his army, Ghazán sent two embassies to Cairo to treat for peace, but without result.<sup>1</sup> Once more the issue of war must be tried and 100,000 Mongols under Kutlughshâh marched into Syria. Damascus was in panic, men deserted their families and fled for protection, people were trampled to death in the crowds that thronged out of the gates, extravagant prices were paid for horses and asses to carry out the terror-stricken population. No such fears disturbed Beybars and the great mamlûks who entered the frightened city in April. They rode out to meet the Mongols, whom they found, 40,000 strong, at Shakhîb on the plain of Marg-es-Suffar,<sup>1</sup> where the Saracens had defeated the army of Heraclius nearly seven centuries before. Nâṣir with the caliph and the main body of the Egyptian army came up from Cairo on the same day. The spectacle was repeated of the defeat of the Egyptian right, with severe loss, by the Mongols, whilst the left and centre remained steady and resisted every assault. At the end of the day the Egyptians were in possession of the field, and the Mongols had retired to a neighbouring hill. "The sultan and his people passed the night on horseback, while the drums were beaten and the cymbals sounded to direct the fugitives to the rallying place, and the mountain on which the Mongols had taken refuge was speedily blockaded. Sâlîr, Kipchak, and the other emirs spent the night in going round the ranks encouraging the men. At sunrise the Egyptian army was seen ranged in order . . . an imposing spectacle. Presently the Mongols descended to meet them, and a vigorous struggle recommenced, several of the sultan's mamlûks having their horses shot under them. The combat lasted till noon, when Kutlughshâh withdrew again to the mountain."<sup>2</sup> Again the Mongols, urged by thirst, came down to force their way through the surrounding enemy, and this time the Egyptians craftily let them through, only to fall upon their retreating squadrons. The exhausted enemy were cut to pieces, or lost in the desert, and it was a miserable remnant that followed Kutlughshâh over the Euphrates. 10,000 prisoners and 30,000 head of cattle fell to the conquerors. The catastrophe almost broke Ghazan's heart : he died soon after, and his May successor, Ulghur, was careful never to risk an encounter<sup>17</sup> with the mamlūks, who had now for the fourth time beaten back the most dangerous enemy that Egypt had encountered since the Muslim conquest.

<sup>1</sup> The correspondence is given in Quatremère, ls., Appendix, II., II. 289 ff., where (209 ff.) will be found an elaborate account of oriental diplomatic and the technical formularies of despatches.

<sup>1</sup> The historians Abû-l-Fidâ and en-Nuwayrî both personally took part in the battle.

<sup>2</sup> Howorth, Mongols ii. 470.

Nāṣir returned to Cairo in a wave of glory. Messengers had announced the news, and the eunuchs vied with one another in setting up costly pavilions, or grand stands, richly decorated and furnished, along the route of his procession. Workmen were forbidden to do anything but set up these triumphal erections. Rooms along the route were let at from £2 to £4 for the day. Silken carpets were laid in the street ; and the proud sultan rode between the brilliant façades and admired the nobles' pavilions, while troops of Mongol prisoners in chains, each with a fellow Mongol's head hanging from his neck, completed the triumph. So noisy were the rejoicings and so deafening the tumult of drums and music throughout Egypt that nothing short of an earthquake sobered the people.<sup>18</sup>

The Mongol war was the great event of Nāṣir's second reign. Beside it the frequent campaigns waged in Cilicia to compel the king of Little Armenia to pay his tribute, or to divert the attention of the mamlūk soldiery from ambitions at home, and a fruitless invasion of Nubia (1304-6), are unimportant. An expedition was equipped in transports built on the Nile to expel the Templars from the island of Aradus (Antartus) on the Syrian coast, the last foothold of the Crusaders, and accomplished its object with the usual slaughter. The relations of the Egyptian sultan with foreign powers continued friendly. The old alliance with the khans of the Golden Horde was maintained, though the mamlūks had no longer any necessity for making common cause against the Persian Mongols. Nubia sent tributary presents (1303), ambassadors came from Morocco,

<sup>1</sup> See below, p. 302.

France, and the emperor of Constantinople (1306), who obtained permission to reopen the church of the Muqābiya at Jerusalem.

Abroad all was favourable, but the internal condition of Egypt left much to be desired. The taxation for the war-chest had caused much poverty and discontent. The Bedawi tribes in Upper Egypt had thrown off the sultan's authority after the disaster at Hims in 1299, and had mockingly nicknamed their own chiefs "Sakūr" and "Beybars" after the two dominant emirs at Cairo.

They levied blackmail on the villages, and called it taxes. The mamlūks made short work of this revolt; the real Salār and Beybars led their troops respectively on the east and west of the Nile, Bektāsh went towards the Fayyūm, other emirs to Suez, whilst the governor of Kūs, with friendly Arabs, cut the desert routes. The various movements were executed with secrecy and rapidity, and the unhappy Bedawis were taken completely by surprise. From Giza and Athlī upwards the inhabitants were put to the sword, to the number of about 16,000 men, whose wives and children and property were seized. If a man claimed to be no Bedawi but a townsman, they bade him pronounce the word dakik (which no Egyptian can say), and as soon as they heard the true Arab guttural, they cut off his head. The shibboleth disposed of a multitude of evaders. The country-side became the scene of horrible massacres, and the corpses poisoned the air. The Bedawis fled to caves in the hills, but their enemies smoked them to death. Among the spoil were the goods of 1600 land-owners, 8000 oxen, 6000 sheep and goats, 4000 horses, and 32,000 camels. The supply was so abundant that a fat tup sold for a couple of shillings, a goat for nine-pence, a pound of butter for twopence. After looting the country the punitive expedition returned to Cairo, leaving behind them an empty land where no man was to be seen.

The Christian and Jewish population also suffered by irrational persecution. Recently they had enjoyed remarkable immunity, and had amassed great wealth.

They rode richly caparisoned horses or mules, wore sumptuous apparel, and held a number of valuable government offices. They waxed, indeed, so independent and (in Muslim eyes) so insolent, that an envoy from Morocco—where such tolerance was incredible—took upon himself to remonstrate with the emirs, the <sup>140</sup> ~~lords~~ were summoned in council, and the result was a revival of the old sumptuary laws. The Christians throughout the empire were to adopt blue turbans, and <sup>141</sup> ~~the~~ the Jews yellow, and neither were permitted to ride horse or mule; they must ride asses and yield the middle of the road to the Muslims; must ring no bells, nor raise the voice, with sundry other humiliating restrictions. Many Christians who valued their appearance became Muslims. Some churches were demolished by the gratified mob at Alexandria and elsewhere, and all the churches in Egypt remained closed for the year. It was only at the request of the emperor of Constantinople that a few churches, such as the Moshaga in the Kair-esh-Shem'a, St. Michael's and St. Nicholas's, were reopened. The "feast of the martyr," or annual Nile festival, a general carnival held on the river near Shubra, was abolished by Beybars, on account of the drinking and disorders that it entailed. The manners of the people had indeed reached an unusual degree of licence. The rejoicings after the triumphant return of the sultan from Syria were prolonged into a drunken and licentious revel. Unveiled women were seen in the company of men drinking wine unabashed on barges in the Hâkimi canal, insomuch that pleasure boats were afterwards forbidden on its waters. The tremendous shock of <sup>142</sup> earthquake that followed gave them something else to think about. The oscillation, the cracking of walls, the fall of houses and mosques, caused a frantic panic. Women rushed into the streets unveiled, and gave birth to premature infants. Men saw their houses crumbling to the ground, and everything they possessed lost; or, flying in amazement, left their homes to be rifled by thieves. The Nile threw its boats a bow-shot on the land. The population encamped outside the city, trembling for the fall of the heavens and the end of the world. The earthquake was felt all through Egypt, and injured Alexandria as well as Kūfah; Damascus and 'Akka experienced the shock. At Cairo the mosques of Hākim, el-Azhar, Sālih b Ruzzik, and Kalā'un, and at Fostat the old mosque of 'Amr, suffered much damage, and for a year and more the chief emirs, notably Salār and Beybars expended large sums on their restoration. Cairo, after the earthquake, looked like a city that had been wrecked by a conquering army.

The wealth of the governing class was fortunately equal to the expense of mosque restoration. The nobles displayed a remarkable public or religious spirit in devoting large sums to this purpose, and besides restoring the ravages of the earthquake, the government completed (1304) and richly endowed the new college of the Nāṣiriyah or collegiate mosque of en Nāṣir (still standing in the Sūk-en-Nahāsin), the Gothic gateway of which had been brought from the cathedral of 'Akka during the demolition of the city by Khalil's orders. There was no lack of money in Egypt. When Bektimur, the polo-master of the court, made the pilgrimage to Mekka in 1301, he spent 85,000 D. on the journey, largely in charitable gifts. The emir Beysari, the most honoured and popular of all the mamlūks, who had declined the throne after the death of Khalil, set no bounds to his extravagance, never drank twice out of the same cup—and his cups were doubtless of chased and inlaid silver, like his perfume-burner in the British Museum—lived in the most splendid palace that money could build, and prided himself on being perpetually £15,000 in debt. The rich fiefs of the mamlūk nobles, increased by sundry emoluments and perquisites, enabled them to maintain a princely state, in spite of frequent dismissal, imprisonment, and confiscation. The luxury and artistic profusion of the times, the remarkable developments of literary and historical studies, and the honourable position of men of learning, form a strange contrast to the constant deeds of violence, the tumults, street fights, murders and atrocious tortures. Egypt was undoubtedly prosperous under this strangely compounded class of rulers. The taxes were heavy, but the Niles had been good, and the trade with Europe was immense : a single ship entering Alexandria harbour is stated to have paid 40,000 D. in customs, and the trade with India must have been equally important. Whatever passed through Egypt was dutiable, and a duty of ten per cent. on trade will account for a vast revenue.<sup>1</sup>

Fig. 64.—Arms of a polo-master.

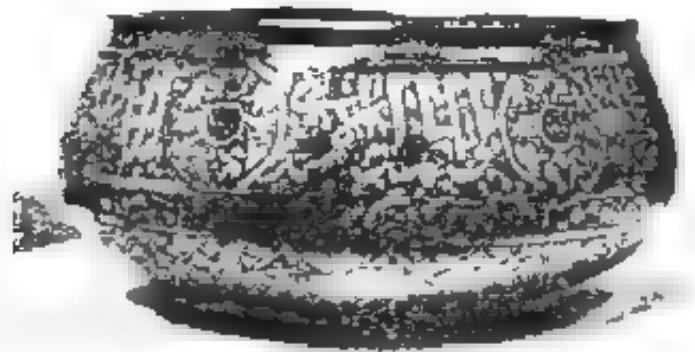

Fig. 65.—Bowl of cult of en-Nisper in the British Museum.

<sup>1</sup> According to el Kalkashandi, who died in 1418, but availed himself of the statistics of earlier writers, the principal source of revenue in Egypt, the land-tax, was paid either in kind (as usually in Upper Egypt) to the amount of from one to three ardelbs (of 5 bushels each) per a re, or in money (as in the delta). In 1370 this tax amounted to 40 dirhems (= 2 D., or about a guinea) on the best land (fat), and 30 on land (dardib) exhausted by wheat crops, etc.; but it was raised in later times. If the crops failed or were poor the tax was

The sultan himself received nothing of all this. He was kept in straitened circumstances by his overbearing ministers, and when Salâr and Deybars fell out and quarrelled over the prey, he found no position yet more intolerable. Once he tried to have them murdered, but the plot was divulged and matters became worse. The people indeed were on his side, and the rumour of a design against his life roused them to a dangerous pitch of excitement—the feeling of loyalty to the house of Kâlikân had become part of their character. But the conduct of the emirs made Nasîr's rule impossible, and perforce in proportion. The towns of Egypt (mean ing apparently the districts) were assigned power to the government of to the emirs and army, except a very small proportion assigned to various nobles etc (A). The government received (1) for the wakîr's exchequer, the taxes from the land of Egypt and Mamluk—(in money and kind) nearly half the clover for the royal and military stables; (2) for the sultans privy purse (dîvâne-i khâs), one-fifth of the revenue from Alexandria and its district. (3) The emirs, mamlûks, and army were assigned (1) the land tax of the remaining towns and districts, varying according to the importance and price, and distributed among the revenues according to their rank; (2) the receipts from (a) the emerald mines, which were, however, abandoned as unprofitable in the last year of Nasîr's reign; (b) the silver mines of Upper Egypt and the Oasis, whence the silver was brought to Hût or Aswan, and shipped down the Nile to Alexandria and sold to Greeks chiefly, at 3 to 3½ d. the pound (B); (c) the copper, (D), of which the government (i.e. the emirs and army) used to take a third, but the system was changed c. 1300. (4) The nation sum of 1,000,000 (near Behnâm), worked since 1 on Tumis days, 100 ac in which the ded 100,000 £ a year and in the Pâkhs district, the black, being a monopoly, rose to 300 dirhems the dirhem, and the sultan took one-third, chiefly for the soldiers pay. (5) the legal claim, which though usually remitted by the sultana herself, were levied by government on the net profit of merchants importing at Alexandria, and from native dealers from Berka. (6) the income from protected subjects i.e. Jews and Christians amounting to 10 to 25 dirhems per head on their population according to classes—this tax was used for judicial and religious services. (7) import duties on goods brought by foreigners to Alexandria or Damietta, who paid one tenth of value to Egypt, one fifth more was exacted, so that goods sometimes paid as much as thirty-five per cent, on their value. (8) inheritances of persons without heirs. (9) profits of coinage, then very reduced. Besides these there were the customs at the ports of 'Ayubâ, Kanayr, Tôr and Suez, on the Red Sea, amounting a quarter of the value; and also on the Syrian caravan. (C. Wontner, Die Geographie und Verwaltung von Ägypten, 155 ff.)

one day he rode away to Karak, on the pretext of a pilgrimage and once within the strong castle he announced his abdication. Remonstrances, sincere or not, were vain ; he was resolved upon a quiet life, and the emirs had to choose a successor.

Beybars the Gîshnegîr, as Master of the Household (Ustâddâr), had gradually acquired the chief influence. Salâr was indeed viceroy, but Beybars was supported by the whole body of the Burjis or citadel mamlûks, and their power was not to be resisted. They had long been planning to raise him to the throne, and the resignation of Nâṣir fitted their intentions. El-Melik el Muazzafî Râkîn-ed-dîn Beybars (II.) el-Manîr<sup>1</sup> accordingly became sultan. His brief reign was an unmitigated failure. He never had the support of the people, and a succession of low Niles and the resulting scarcity were ignorantly connected in some manner with his mismanagement. A large number of the mamlûk emirs belonged to the party of Salâr, who, although he accepted the office of viceroy, secretly worked against his former colleague. The ex-sultan at Karak was not idle in the meantime. He had retired for repose, he said, but his proceedings showed that he had merely withdrawn from the control of his Egyptian emirs in order to organize a loyal party in Syria. In face of these preparations and signals of revolution all that Beybars did was to make Suleyman el-Mustekhl proclaim his accession anew. But no one respected the faintéant "Commander of the Faithful"; the emir Barlughî, a supporter of Beybars, laughed, "Suleymin was the Commander of the Wind"; the people, when they heard the name of Nâṣir in the proclamation, shouted "God save him," and when the name of Beybars was read they called out, "We do not want him." The news came that Nâṣir had entered Damascus, and had received the homage of the emirs of Syria, of Aleppo, Hamah, Hims, Tripolis, Safed, Jerusalem; that his advanced guard had reached Gaza, and driven back the Egyptian outposts. Beybars had no counter plan, and could command no efficient support. He took the only prudent course, and sent his abdication and submission to the advancing sultan. Nāṣir accepted, pardoned, and offered him the government of Suhyūn. But meanwhile his fears had so worked upon Beybars that he had fled from Cairo with his mamlūk guard (who soon deserted him), vacillated between several plans of escape, and was finally made a prisoner at Gaza.

<sup>1</sup> A few small copper coins of Beybars II bear the dates 708, 709, parts of which years correspond to 1309.

<sup>1310</sup>
<sup>Mar. 1</sup> Nāṣir began his third reign,<sup>1</sup> entering Cairo on 5 March, 1310, after eleven months' retirement. Whatever kindly virtues he may have possessed in his youth had been soured and embittered by his unhappy experience. Though only in his twenty-fifth year, he was already a cynic, a double-dealer, and thirsty to revenge the miseries of his boyhood and youth, and to free himself finally from the interference of the powerful emirs. He managed it by trickery and deceit. Beybars, though apparently received into favour, and appointed to a government, was invited to Cairo, and there bow-strung. Nāṣir could not forgive him, among other painful recollections, for having refused him roast goose when he asked for it in his years of humiliation. Salār soon followed his rival: he had aided Nāṣir's restoration and welcomed him handsomely with costly gifts, and in reward was given the small command of Shawbek. Recalled to the capital, he was cast into prison and starved to death. After eight days of hunger, three covered dishes were sent to him by the sultan. The covers were raised, and they proved to be, the first a dish of gold money, the second of silver, and the third of precious stones and pearls. "Praise to God," he said, "who deals me out my chastisement in this life." On the twelfth day he was found dead, with a gnawed-off finger in his mouth. His vast wealth was confiscated to the state, and the income of his estates and properties were reckoned at 1000 D. a day. A contemporary historian, who saw the inventory of his effects, stated that the examination of his goods occupied four days, and that they found over half a million of dinars or their value in dirhems, besides chests of precious stones and pearls, silver vessels, dresses, horses, dromedaries, herds of cattle and sheep, and multitudes of slaves. One by one the older emirs who had fought the wars of his father, and had dominated the son in his earlier reigns, were inveigled, betrayed, imprisoned, and executed. Nasir had learnt his lesson : he resolved to rule alone and he had no scruples in "cutting off the tall poppies."

<sup>1</sup> Coins of Nāṣir's third reign bear the dates, Cairo, 710, 716, 733, 741 (1310-40); Aleppo, 710, 733; Damascus, 733, 735; Tripolis, 717.

His foreign policy followed the precedents of his father Kalā'un and Beybars I, except that altered conditions made him eager to draw closer to the Mongols of Persia.

Fig. 66.—Inscription in medallion of prince Tatar el Higizly at Cairo, 1360.

He had frequent relations with the Ilkhān Abū-Sa'īd, with whom he concluded a friendly treaty in 1333, and on the break up of the Ilkhānate on Abū-Sa'īd's death, he carried on various negotiations with the candidates for power, and his support was so desired that Sheykh Hasan Buzurg, one of the most powerful of the contending leaders, went so far as to acknowledge Nasir's suzerainty in prayers and coinage at Baghdad (1341) in return for the promise of armed assistance, which never came. Nevertheless, the old friendship with the rival Mongol state, the Golden Horde of Sarai on the Volga, was maintained and renewed, though the dealings with Persia caused some uneasiness to Uzbeg Khan, and Nasir's proposal to marry the khān's daughter fell through by reason of the extravagance of the dowry demanded from Egypt. A cheaper bride, however, was found in a kinswoman of the khān, the lady Tuibiya, whose mausoleum in the eastern Karāfa still bears witness to the alliance, and who is, perhaps, the only princess of the Saracens who has been celebrated by a western poet:—

Mira al Cairo que incluye tres ciudades
El palacio real de Dultibea,
Las torres, los jardines e heredales
(Que su espacioso círculo rodea).<sup>1</sup>

There were, as heretofore many little wars with the Cilician kingdom. At Mekka the ruling sherifs were appointed by Egypt, and supported by troops, not without conflicts, and in 1317 Nasir's authority was also recognized at Medina. The sultan himself thrice made the pilgrimage to Mekka with the usual extravagant display of charity. Yemen, independent under the Rasūlid kings, had from time to time sent presents to Cairo, which the sultans were anxious to recognize as tribute, but although an expedition of 5000 Egyptian troops was sent in 1325 at the request of a Rasūlid, whose succession was disputed, it ended in disaster, and southern Arabia was in no sense under the authority of Nasir. Nubia, under the usurper Kenz-ed-dawla, was equally independent at that time.<sup>2</sup> On the other hand, to the west, the khūṭba was said in the sultan's name at Tripolis and Tunis (1311-17) by the Hafṣid king Abū-Zekeryā Yahyā, whom Nasir had helped to the throne.

<sup>1</sup> Araucana, canto 28.

<sup>2</sup> The tribe of Kenz had been a thorn in the side of Egypt from the time of Saladin, and there were frequent conflicts with them in the 14th century; they attacked Aswān in 1366, 1385, about 1390, 1396; and after 1403 the district of Aswān ceased for a time to be under Egyptian authority.

Most of these cases of apparent vassalage were due to Egyptian succour during a period of civil war and a disputed succession, and they testify rather to the military efficiency of the mamlük army than to any permanent extension of the sultan's authority. Egypt had become a factor to be reckoned with whenever complications arose among her neighbours, but she did not expand beyond her normal frontiers, which had long been laid at the Syrian desert, the Euphrates and the

Fig. 67.—Tower in Citadel of Cairo.

Pyramus in the east and north, Sawakin and Aswān in the south and Tripolis in the west. Nāṣir himself was ambitious of empire, but he was no general and feared to arm a possible rival with the command of a large army. He was forced indeed to suppress a revolt of the Druzes and Nuṣayris by force, and to wage war with Little Armenia; but he trusted rather to diplomacy to extend his influence. His negotiations in the north procured him the adhesion of Artina of Asia Minor and the chief of Dhū-l-Kadr.<sup>4</sup> He continually exchanged embassies with the Mongols of Kipchak, as well as those of Persia with the kings of the Yemen and Abyssinia and West Africa, with the emperors of Constantinople and the kings of Bulgaria. Even the sultan of India, the king of Aragon, the pope, and the king of France sent envoys to his court. The missions of the Byzantine emperors, often repeated [e.g. 1317, 1320] were apparently designed to negotiate an alliance with Nāṣir against the Turkomans who were growing constantly stronger about this time in Asia Minor, and already threatened the East Roman empire. The sultan of Hindustan, who sent an embassy to Nāṣir in 1331-2 by way of Baghdad was Mohammad ibn Tughlak, who was meditating the conquest of eastern Persia, and probably wished to engage Nāṣir in a simultaneous attack on the Mongol kingdom in western Persia. In 1327 an envoy from the pope arrived to urge him to treat his Christian subjects humanely promising in return to protect, as far as possible, Mohammedan subjects living in Christendom from annoyance. Philip VI of France sent an embassy in 1330 . . . demanding that Nāṣir should deliver up Jerusalem and part of the coast of Palestine to the Christians, it was naturally dismissed with scorn.<sup>5</sup>

The Christians were better used under Nāṣir's third reign than before, and the sultan endeavoured to relax the humiliating decree of 1301, as far as he could, not without exciting the wrath of the theologians and fanatical fakīhs. He protected the churches from destruction, and refused to believe that every fire or other calamity must be due to Christian conspiracy, as the bigoted Muslims said. But fanaticism was too strong for him; 20,000 men assembled on the meydan and clamoured: "The only true religion is Islam; God shield the faith of Mohammad! O sultan of Islam, protect us, not the unbelieving Christians!" Nāṣir surrendered to public opinion, and the former decree was enforced again on pain of death. The Christians closed their churches, and dared not show themselves, unless in disguise.<sup>1</sup> They had undoubtedly burnt many mosques and houses, and in revenge the Muslims demolished scores of their churches and monasteries. Still the sultan used his influence in their favour, whenever there was an opportunity, and his wezirs, several of whom were Christians who had become nominally Muslims, exerted themselves for their old associates, whilst they bled the Mohammadan subjects as far as taxation could go. Nasir employed Christians, i.e. Copts, as all Egyptian governments have employed them, because they were better men of business

<sup>4</sup> Wel, iv. 352-4.

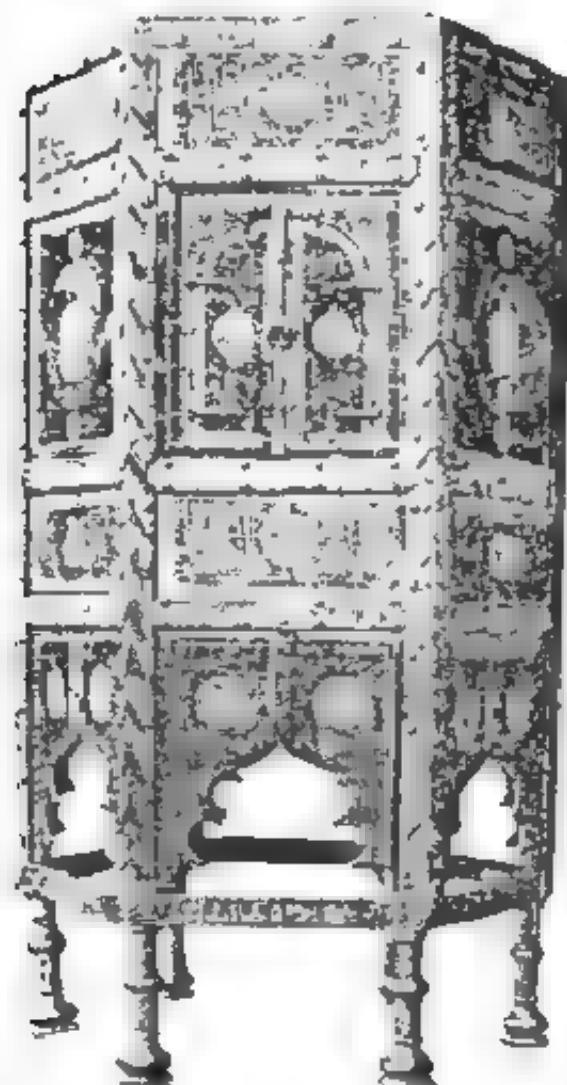

Fig. 68.—Kursi of en-Nāṣir, 14th century, in the Cairo Museum.

<sup>1</sup> The best account of the state of the Christians under the mamluk sultans—merely incidental to the present work—is in Quarremère's Mémoires sur l'Egypte, II. 220-66. The émeute of 1321 alone occupies twenty-four pages, and it is impossible to give the details in a brief space.

than the Muslims, and also because they were not dangerous to his throne, as were the great Muslim officers, against whom he was perpetually on his guard, and whom he used with cruel severity.

On the other hand, his humbler servants and officers, and the bulk of the people of Egypt were well off under his rule. Many oppressive taxes—on salt, for example, on chickens, on sugar-cane, on boats and their passengers, on slaves, horses, etc.—were repealed, and the loss was made up by mulcting the great nobles. He ordered a new survey of the land and its revenues, and out of the twenty-four divisions of the country, he assigned ten to the state and the other fourteen to the emirs and army, according to rank. He combated the extravagant prices which prevailed in times of scarcity, and had millers and bakers flogged who charged too highly, imported corn from Syria and fixed its market price, and compelled the emirs to open their granaries to public sale, instead of selling their corn privately at exorbitant rates.

<sup>132*</sup> His muhtasib or inspector of markets, Dīyā-ed-dīn Yūsuf, an upright and fearless man, reported any evasions to the sultan, who publicly rated the great emir Kawṣān, his own son-in law, struck him over the head with the flat of his sword, and had the emir's factor flogged in his presence. These vigorous measures had their effect, and a moderate price for corn prevailed. Nasir was strict in suppressing wine-drinking and every sort of immorality, and his punishments were as barbarous and primitive as his methods of confiscation were sweeping and illegal. Sometimes, indeed, the judges found it necessary to remonstrate with his high-handed proceedings, and they were sure of a hearing. Learned men found an appreciative patron in the cool calculating sultan, whose intellect was of no mean order. The learned historian Abū-l-Fidā, a prince descended from Saladin's brother, was his intimate friend. Nasir restored him (1310) to his ancestors' principedom of Hamah, revived the ancient titles and privileges of his family, took him with him on pilgrimage to Mekka, made the Syrian governors treat him as a sultan, himself addressed him as "brother," and continued to love and honour him till his death (1331). The age was rich in learned men, and they enjoyed every mark of respect and not inconsiderable emoluments under Nasir's rule.

It was an age of extraordinary brilliance in almost every aspect. In spite of the occasional records of scarcity and high prices, the wealth of the country, whether from its fertile soil, or from the ever-increasing trade with Europe and the east, was immense, if the fortunes of individuals are any test. The accounts of the almost fabulous prodigality of the emirs of the time in the Arabic chronicles show their vast resources, and the thirty or more magnificent mosques built by Nasir's emirs—such as Sengar el-Gawâhî, Kawqûn, el-Mâridâni, Aksunkur, Sheykhû, to name but a few whose monuments are still standing, are proof that they sometimes spent their wealth to good purpose.<sup>1</sup> The architecture of this period is perhaps the finest in the history of Saracenic art in Egypt. The minor arts were never cultivated in greater perfection. Beautiful bowls, perfume-bearers, caskets, Korân-cases, and zurâs or small tables, were made of bronze or brass, often cut out à jour, and inlaid with admirably chased designs in silver. Enamelled glass lamps, illuminated Korâns, carved wooden panels, painted ceilings, and every kind of decoration, were worked at this period in greater perfection than ever before or since. When a beautiful example of the finest Saracenic art is preserved in our museums, we are almost sure to find in its inscription the words el-Melekî en-Nâṣirî, "the (mamlük) of el Melik en-Nâṣir."

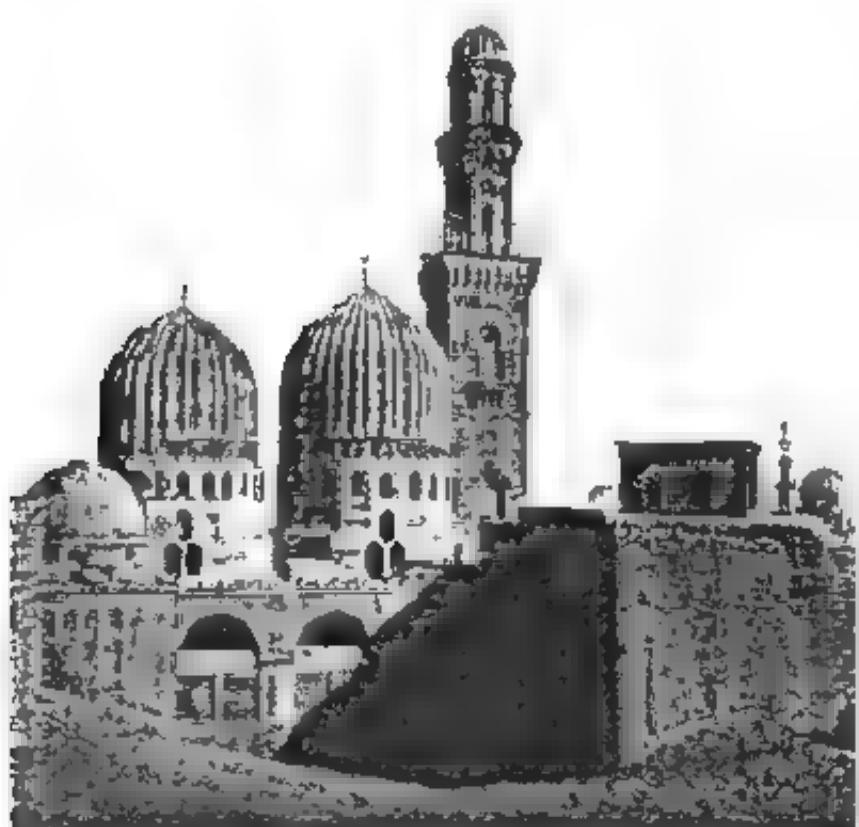

Fig. 69.—Mosque of Sengar and Salär, 1323.

The sultan himself led the way in these civilized tastes. Some of his own furniture—or that of his mosques—has been preserved, and his two chief buildings, the Nâṣiriva college in the Sûk-en-Nab-

Fig. 70.—Arms of emir el-Mâridâni, 14th century, from a glass lamp.

hâsin (corresponding to part of the old Beyn-el-Kâreyn), built in 1299-1304, and his mosque (1318) in the Citadel of Cairo, are among the most notable of Saracenic monuments. His exquisite palace in the Citadel, the Kasr el-Ablak, or Striped Palace, so called from its tiers of black and white stone, which cost 500,000,000 dirhems (founded 1312) has unhappily disappeared; the "Hall of Columns" was standing early in this century. The Citadel, indeed, was largely reconstructed in 1312 and following years, and a number of new buildings added.<sup>1</sup> He was reckoned to spend at one time 8000 dirhems (about £300) a day on building. Among the lence to pilgrims, and his sitting twice a week to hear personally all complaints and petitions, and gives a short list of the chief emirs and men of learning. His account is lamentably meagre, and instead of valuable statistics he informs us that there were said to be 12,000 water-carriers on camels, 30,000 bani-masters, and 36,000 boats on the Nile. (Ed. Delémery et Sangüineti, t. 67 ff.)

<sup>1</sup> Ibn-Batûta, who visited Cairo in 1326, writes of the emulation of the emirs in building mosques, chapels, and especially mentions their monasteries (khândâkâh—such as that of Beybars II, still standing), where fâkihs, chiefly Persian fâkihs, lived in retreat under strict rules. Separate monasteries, he says, were allowed to married devotees. He describes Nâṣir as "of noble character and great virtues," refers to his benevo-

Fig. 71.—Hall of Columns built by al-Nasir in Citadel of Cairo, 1313.

<sup>1</sup> See Casanova in Acad. de la miss. archéol. française, vi 619-665.

public works of his reign was the Alexandrian canal, which connected the port with the Nile at Fûwa, and contributed greatly to the commerce and fertility of the country, and to the revival of the neglected Greek capita. The great causeway he constructed beside the Nile served at once as a road and a dam during the inundation. The aqueduct from the Nile to the Citadel of Cairo was the work of this sultan (1311), though popularly ascribed to Saladin. To carry out his schemes, and indulge his tastes, he needed immense revenues, and the money was not lacking. He married eleven of his daughters to leading emirs, and each wedding cost him 800,000*D.*: the music alone came to 10,000*D.* for each fête. He was a judge of horses, and would give as much as a million dirhems (£4000) for a fine animal. He kept of course a proper stud book, and knew the name, age, price, and pedigree of every horse. Three thousand fillies annually foaled in his stables were broken in by Bedawis, to be given to the emirs or entered for races, for which he was an ardent trainer. Nâṣir was a farmer, too, and would import sheep of good breeds for his flock of 30,000 kept in the Citadel. He was a sportsman, devoted to falconry, and his huntsmen, falconers, and gamekeepers held no unimportant rank in his court, and received handsome vales. He was also a collector of precious stones, but this was the ordinary mode of amassing portable and easily negotiable capital. Whilst encouraging luxury and profusion in his court, he wore no jewels himself and dressed in the simplest and least expensive way. This self-possessed, iron-willed too, and would import sheep of good breeds for his flock of 30,000 kept in the Citadel. He was a sportsman, devoted to falconry, and his huntsmen, falconers, and gamekeepers held no unimportant rank in his court, and received handsome vales. He was also a collector of precious stones, but this was the ordinary mode of amassing portable and easily negotiable capital. Whilst encouraging luxury and profusion in his court, he wore no jewels himself and dressed in the simplest and least expensive way. This self-possessed, iron-willed man,—absolutely despotic, ruling alone—physically insignificant, small of stature, lame of a foot, and with a cataract in the eye,—with his plain dress and strict morals, his keen intellect and unwearied energy, his enlightened tastes and interests, his shrewd diplomacy degenerating into fruitless deceit, his unceasing suspicion and cruel vengefulness, his superb court, his magnificent buildings,—is one of the most remarkable characters of the Middle Ages. His reign was certainly the climax of Egyptian culture and civilization<sup>1</sup>.

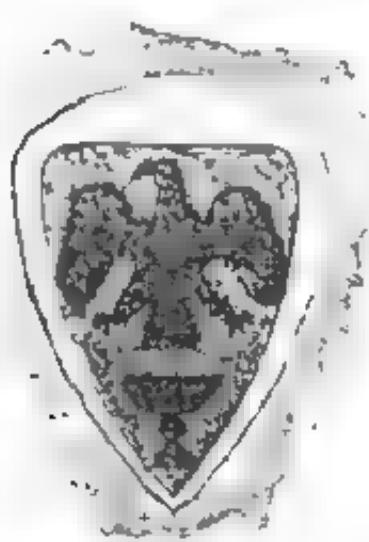

Fig. 72.—Arms of emir Tukuz-demir, from a lamp in the British Museum, 14th century.

Unhappily when he died, confessing his sins, in 1341,<sup>1341
June 6</sup> at the age of nearly fifty-eight, he left no successor capable of carrying on his work. The confidence of the people in his firm government, and their apprehensions of what would follow, was shown in the panic with which, blind daughter of it remained they would support it to the death." For forty-one years, indeed, twelve descendants<sup>2</sup> of Nāṣir rapidly succeeded to the throne, but shops and laid in provisions for the time of need. His emirs gathered round his bed, and declared solemnly that "they were the mamlūks of his house, and so long as even a they cannot be said to have ruled. Eight sons, two grandsons, and two great-grandsons followed one another. Some were mere children, some held the title of sultan for a few months, one son, Hasan, was kept on the throne for four years, and was restored for six years more; one grandson, Sha'bān, even retained the title of sultan for fourteen years. But when they were not helpless children they were commonly helpless debauchees, and the real power was in the hands of the great emirs, of whom Kūqūn (or Kawqūn, a Mongol follower of Nasir's Kipchak bride), Tashmir, Aksunkur, Sheykhu, Yelbugha and Dargitnush, were the most prominent.

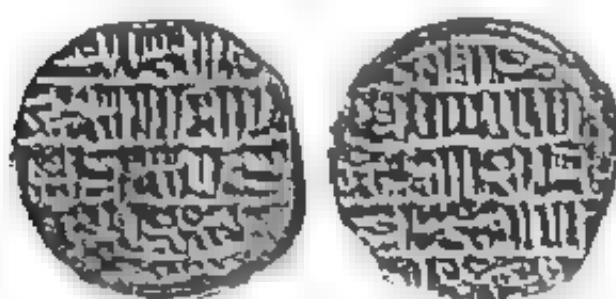

Fig. 73.—Dinar of en-Nāṣir, Cairo, 1340.

<sup>1</sup> The best European account of Nāṣir's reign is in the careful Geschichte der Chasiren, by Weil, founded upon Maqrizi, Abu-l-Mahāsin, and most of the available Arabic sources. It has been epitomized, unfortunately with many errors, by Sir W. Muir, Zāfi Mamlūk or Slave Dynasty of Egypt.

<sup>2</sup> Of these successors, the coins are as follows:—et-Ṣalih Ismā'īl, Cairo, 744, Damascus, 743, 744; Ḥamāb, 746, Aleppo, no date; et-Kāmil Ṣu'bān, Cairo, 747, Damascus, 746; et-Muqaffar Ḫāggī, Cairo, 747, Damascus, 747 (Dhū-l-Hijjā); en-Nāṣir Ḥāmūn (first reign), Cairo, 748, 749, 750, 752, Damascus, 749, 750; et-Ṣalib Sālib, Cairo, 752, 753, 754, Damascus, 756; Ḥasan (second reign),

The court remained as luxurious and extravagant as ever, the emirs continued to amass wealth and to build exquisite mosques and palaces, and the prestige of Egypt still held the respect of foreign powers. But the contests of the emirs and the anarchy that ensued brought the empire to financial straits, and the pilgrimage to Mekka was more than once abandoned for lack of state funds; though money seems never to have been lacking for the singers and slave girls of the palace. Sheykhu endeavoured spasmodically to stem the tide of dissolution, reduced expenses, allowed the sultan Hasan only £4 a day, repressed the Bedawi brigands who infested the Nile valley; but the visitation of the plague in Cairo, 754, 756, 757, [758], 759, 760, 761, Alexandria, 756, [759], Damascus, 758, 760, 761, 762; el-Manṣūr Muḥammad, Cairo, 761, 762, 763, 764, Damascus, 763; el-Ashraf Sha'bān, Cairo, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 773, 774, 776, Alexandria, 766, 777, Damascus, 766, 771, 773, 774, 777, Aleppo, Hamāh, Tripolis, without legible dates, el-Manṣūr 'Aṭā, Cairo, 779, 781, Damascus, 778, 780, 781, 782, Aleppo, 778; eq-Salih Ḥaggī, Damascus, Aleppo, without dates; Damascus, 792, with title el-Manṣūr.

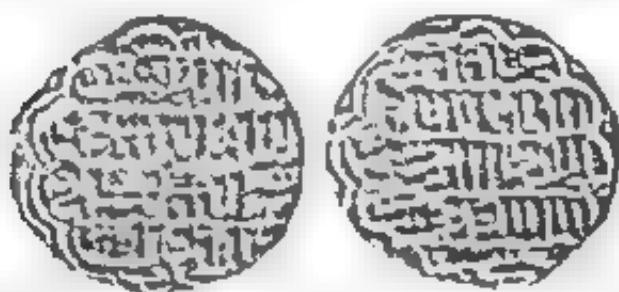

Fig. 74.—Dinars of sultan Hasan, Cairo, 1349.

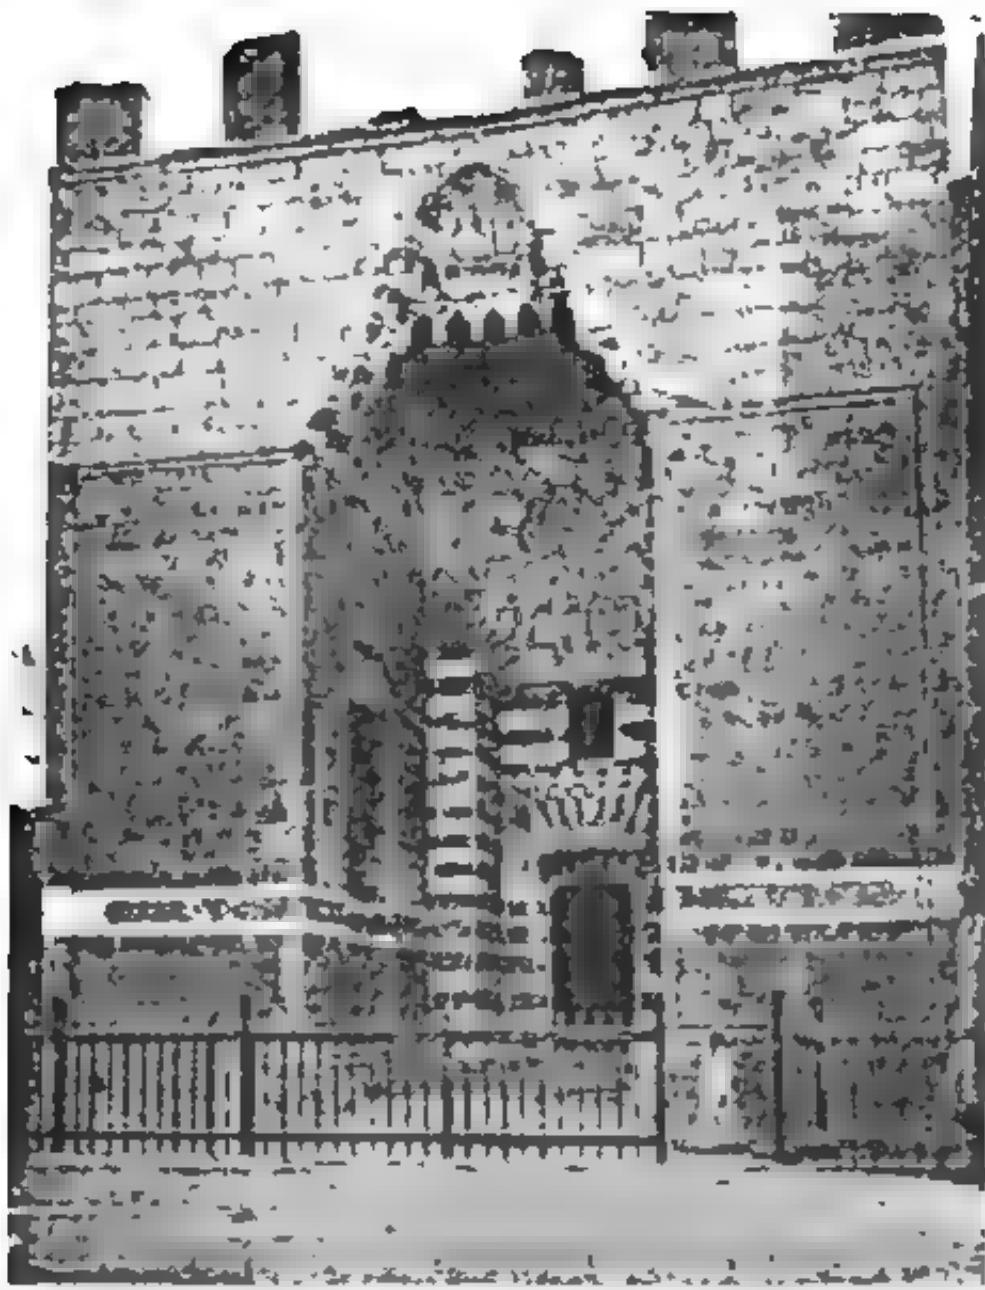

Fig. 75.—Palace of emir Yeshbek at Cairo, 1476, adjoining mosque of sultan Hassan 1348-9—the same "Black Death" that spread over Europe at this time—reduced the country to a desperate state, 10,000 to 20,000 people died in Cairo in a single day; cattle murrain and fruit disease accompanied the plague, the fish of the river were poisoned, cities were emptied and the land laid waste.

Of external affairs there is little to record in the brief reigns of Nāṣir's descendants.

<sup>1359</sup> A little victory at Mekka over the king of the Yemen, another at Singār in Mesopotamia over a Kurdish band of brigands, a temporary adhesion of a rebel governor at Baghhdād, who struck coins as a vassal of Egypt (1362), a punitive expedition against the marauding Bedawis in Upper Egypt, and another (supplied by boats which were carried over the first cataract) into Nubia with a similar object (1365), the customary attacks upon Little Armenia (where Adhana, Tarsus, and el-Maseīsa were taken, and the first two garrisoned), were of small importance. The descent of a hostile European fleet upon Alexandria was a new experience after more than a century of rest from Crusading zeal. Peter of Lusignan, king of Cyprus, supported by the knights of Rhodes and the Genoese Oct. and Venetians, suddenly landed 12,000 men, seized Alexandria, plundered it, and sailed away with 5000 prisoners. The Christians of Egypt were made to pay their ransoms and subscribe for the building of a fleet at Cairo and Tripolis. Again in 1369 the Cyprian fleet attacked Tripolis and appeared off Alexandria, but to little purpose, and after some negotiation peace was made with <sup>1370</sup> Cyprus and the republics. More significant were the hostilities with the Turkman chiefs of Dhū l-Kadr, on <sup>1371</sup> the northern frontier of Syria, whereby some useful auxiliaries, who had guarded the marches, were converted into enemies—the forerunners of the Turks who conquered Egypt a hundred and forty years later.

Fig. 76. Memorial inscription in tomb of sultan Hassan, 1384.

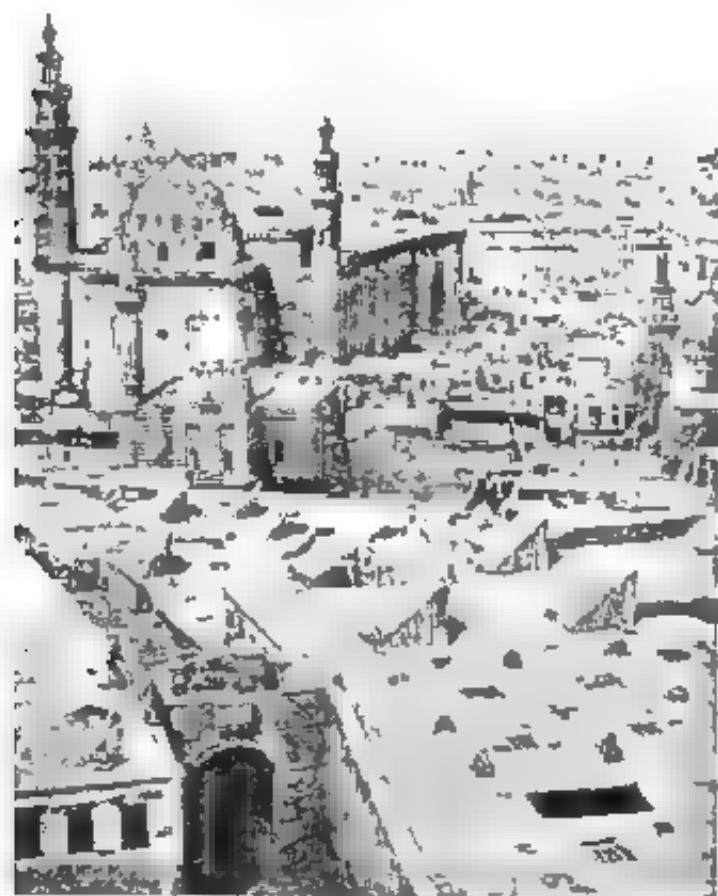

Fig. 77.—Mosque of sultan Hasan, 1362, from the Citadel.

There could be but one end to the series of puppets who had figured as nominal sultans since Nāṣir's death. Some emir, more powerful and fortunate than the rest, would seize the throne, as Beybars and Kalā'ūn had seized it a century ago. The man appeared in Barkūk, who after disposing of one after the other of his competitors, de-throned the last of Kalā'ūn's house in 1382, and founded the dynasty of the Burqī or Circassian sultans. The only wonder was that so feeble a line as Nāṣir's descendants should have survived so long in so stormy a world.

CHAPTER XI

THE CIRCASSIAN MAMLEKS

1382—1517

Auctoritates.—El-Makhrūs, Abū-ibn-Malikshāh, El-Isyāq, el-Kalbāshāhī, Well, Gesch. der Chalifen, v., von Hammer, Ges. d. d. chines. Asiedler, ii. Monuments in Egypt.—Torah of Anas, father of Barkūk, 1382; Mērīsa of emir Ajmūn, 1383; Medr. Barkūk, 1386. Mērī em. Ināl-el-Vusūlī, 1393; Medr. em. Maktūb, 1395; Medr. em. Südūn, 1402; Mērī Isma'īl ed-Dīn, 1408; Khanakah and tombs of Farag and Barkūk, 1409 ff.; Mērī Fāris; Mērī em. 'Aṣlān el-Ulān, 1413; Māzayid, Mārīnān, 1418, and M., 1420. Mērī Kāfi Atāl-el-Jasūr, 1420, Bari-Bey, Medr., 1424. Khanakah and T., 1427, M. at el-Khānkhāh, 1437. M. em. Qāfi Bek, 1437; M. em. Kāfi Bek, 1437. Medr. em. Taghīn-Bek, 1440. M. em. Kāfi-Bey, 1441. M. and T. Kāfi Yābi'a, 1444, 1446; M. Gāfiyyah, 1449; Medr., Kāfiyyah, and T. Ināl, 1451-6; T. em. Gāfiyyah, 1465; M. em. Südūn, c. 1466; Medr. em. Kārim, c. 1466; M. em. Timārī, 1472; M. em. Uzbeck (Fātak), 1473; Palace em. Yashīn, 1476.—Kāfi Bey, Medr. and T., 1474. Medr. em. waqf, 1475; Wukāla near Azhar, 1477, restor. of bridge of Gīza, 1479, castle (Burg el-Zafar), on site of old pharaos at Alexandria, 1479. Babil, 1479. Wukāla near Zāb-en-Nāj, 1480. Wukāla in Sāwīya, c. 1480. T. el-Faqārah, c. 1481. Palace, 1484. Mekān, 1485, restor. of southern gates, 1486. Medr. at Kāfi. 1491.—Medr. em. Ghādūn, 1492; Medr. Kāfi Abu Bekr b. Ayyūb, 1492; M. em. Kāfiyyah, 1494. Mērī em. Uzbeck (Fātak) el-Vusūlī, 1495; Palace of em. Māmāy (Bey el-Kāfi), 1496; T. el-Zāhir Kāntūs, 1499; M. princess Asāl-Bey, wife of Kāfi Bey, in Fāyyūm, 1499; T. el-Adil Iumān-Bey, 1501; M. em. Kāfiyyah, 1502. Diedr. Kāfi Bek emir Asħur 1503.—Kāsīsh el-Ghūl, Mērī 1503. T. 1504, restor. of aqueduct to Citadel, c. 1506. M. near Qādel, 1510. Gates of Khān-el-Khanīt.—Tombs of Tārīk Bey, Kānnah Dūqū, 1504-5, Medr. Kāfi-Bek Kāma, 1506.

Inscriptions in Egypt.—On monuments enumerated above: solar quadrant in M. Kāfiyyah, 1383; decree of Kāmīnūr in T. Kāfiyyah, 1389; inscr. Barkūk in Citadel, 1389; 'Abd-el-'Azzīz in T. of Farag, 1403, 1408; waqf act in Medr. Bari-Bey, 1424, and Khanakah, 1431; tablet of 'Abd al-Hāsib Bey in Scheher collection, 1433; Gāfiyyah in Fāyyūm, 1441, in Citadel, 1448, and in Medr. Barkūk; tablet Kāfiyyah of Mu'ayyadī; solar quadrant in Medr. Ināl, 1466, epitaph of princess Shāhīd, daughter of Farag, in his tomb, 1482; inscr. of Kāfi-Bey in June, 1483, and in Azhar, 1469, 1495; Tumān-Bey in Citadel, 1501; el-Ghūl on castle of Kāt-Bey at Alexandria, 1501; in Azhar (M. van Berchem, Cop., Inscr. Arab., iii., proof sheets).

Inscriptions in Syria.—Barkūk in Kubbat-es-Sakhra and on a khan at Jerusalem, on great mosques of Gaza and Ba'albek, acropole of Ba'albek, citadel of Aleppo; Mu'ayyad, in mosque at Gaza, on wall and hospital of Aleppo, portico of gr. M. at Damascus and his own M.; Ahmad, decree in haram, Jerusalem; Bars-Bey, decrees in Kubbat-es-Sakhra Jerusalem, in gr. M. of Damascus and Tripoli, and on castle of Sheyar, and inscr. on bridge at Sheyar; Gākmaq, inscr. in his madrāsa at Damascus, decrees on Armenian convent, Jerusalem, in the haram, and in gr. M. of Damascus; İnal, decrees in the gr. M. of Damascus, Tripoli, and Ba'albek; Khāshkādām, on citadel of Damascus; Kāt-Bey, numerous inscr. and decrees at Jerusalem and in gr. M. of Damascus, Tripoli, Ba'albek, Hamāh, and several inscr. on citadel of Aleppo; Mohammed b. Kāt-Bey, inscr. on citadel of Damascus and in gr. M. of Gaza; el-'Adil Tūmān Bey, several decrees at Damascus (MISS, notes of M. van Berchem).

Coin (see under reigns); armored bearings; crammed glass lamps; bowls and other vessels, etc.

BURG'I MAXLÜKS.

El-Zahir Seyf-ed-din Barkūk	Nov., 1382
[Interrupted by el-Mansūr Hāqiqi June 1389—Feb. 1390]
El-Nāṣir Nāṣir-ed-din Farīq b. Barkūk	June, 1399
El-Mansūr 'Imād-ed-din 'Abd-el-'Azīz b. Barkūk	Sept., 1405
El-Nāṣir Farīq (again)	Dec., 1405
El-'Adil el-Mustā'in ('Abdāsīd caliph)	May, 1412
El-Mu'ayyad Sheykh	Nov., 1412
El-Muqaffar Ahmed b. Sheykh	Jan., 1421
El-Zahir Seyf-ed-din Tatar	Aug., 1421
El-Şalih Nāṣir-ed-din Muhammed b. Tatar	Nov., 1421
El-Ashraf Seyf-ed-din Bars-Bey	April, 1422
El-'Azīz Gāmil-ed-din Vusai b. Bars-Bey	June, 1438
El-Zahir Seyf-ed-din Gākmaq	Sept., 1438
El-Mansūr Fakhr-ed-din 'Othman b. Gākmaq	Feb., 1451
El-Ashraf Seyf-ed-din İnal	March, 1453
El-Mu'ayyad Shahab-ed-din Ahmed b. İnal	Feb., 1461
El-Zahir Seyf-ed-din Khāshkādām	June, 1461
El-Zahir Seyf-ed-din Yel-Bey	Oct., 1467
El-Zahir Timirbugha	Dec., 1467
El-Ashraf Seyf-ed-din Kāt-Bey	Jan., 1468
El-Nāṣir Muhammed b. Kāt-Bey	Aug., 1496
El-Zahir Kānsukh	Oct., 1498
El-Ashraf Gānbālit	June, 1500
El-'Adil Tūmān-Bey	Jan., 1501
El-Ashraf Kānsukh-el-Ğūl	April, 1501
El-Ashraf Tūmān-Bey	Oct., 1516 —Jan., 1517

THE second dynasty of mamlûk sultans differed from the first chiefly in race and in the absence of any hereditary succession such as was gradually established in the earlier dynasty, in the family of Kalâ'în. The Burgh sultans were all Circassians by race, save two (Khâsh-kudam and Timurbugha) who were of Greek origin; and none of them was able to establish the hereditary principle in his family. They were in fact rather head-mamlûks or chief emirs than kings in the absolute sense understood in the east. The Circassian sultan was but primus inter pares elected by his fellow mamlûks, and depending for the tenure of his power upon his skill in managing the military oligarchy which was the real authority of the kingdom. His success or failure was in proportion to his tact or diplomacy, and still more to his liberality, and to the divisions among the several factions of the mamlûks. Each sultan's followers, after his death, formed a distinct party, known by his regnal title (as Ashrafi, Nasîri, Muayyadî, Zâhirî), and animated by a strong esprit de corps and a determination to win and keep as much power and wealth as possible. By manoeuvring with these parties, forming coalitions or fostering jealousies, by intrigues and bribes, an emir would contrive to be elected sultan; but when on the throne, he found himself little better than a delegate of his insubordinate electors, over whom he seldom maintained much discipline. If he held the throne till his death, his son usually succeeded him for a few months, less in deference to any hereditary tradition referring to earlier times, than for the purpose of acting as a buffer between the ambitions of rival emirs. The son kept the throne warm, whilst the leading nobles fought for the succession; and when the best man won, the "warming-pen" was put away. As a rule he was either placed in honourable confinement, or even allowed to live freely and openly in some Egyptian city, and was seldom put to death in the old fashion. Of the twenty-three sultans of this dynasty, the reigns of six cover 103 out of the total 234 years, and the reigns of nine—Barbâk, Farâg, Sheykh, Bars-Bey, Gâlkîmâk, Inâl, Khâshkudam, Kâit-

Rey, and Kānsūh el-Ghūrī, amount to 125 years, leaving but nine years for the other fourteen sultans.

It is with these nine sultans that history has chiefly to do: the rest were ciphers, but the nine were all remarkable men, as indeed their success in winning and keeping their power for eight, sixteen, or even twenty-six years implies. It needed no ordinary abilities to hold even a partial authority over rival emirs and seditious mamluks for any length of time. Their abilities, however, were seldom those of the warrior-king. They often fought their way to the throne over the corpses of rivals, but once there they seldom led their armies in the field, and Farag was perhaps the only Circassian sultan who was conspicuously a general. Several of them—as Barkūk, Shéikh, Gakmāk, Kāt Bey, besides the short-reigned Tātār and Timūrbuglī—were much attached to literature and the society of the learned; they were strict, sometimes even austere, Muslims, and many of their pious foundations, mosques, colleges, hospitals, and schools, still bear eloquent witness to their aesthetic refinement. Perhaps the costly elaboration of such exquisite architectural gems as the mosques of Barqūk and Kāt-Bey were intended to atone for the many acts of barbarity and oppression of which the Circassian sultans were commonly guilty. Barkūk caused his rival, Muntashī, to be "put to the question" in order to make him reveal his hidden treasure: the wretched emir's limbs were broken one after the other, he was tried by fire, tortured with infernal ingenuity, but all in vain, at last he was put out of his agony, and his head was displayed on a lance through the towns of Syria and exposed at the gate of Zawīla at Cairo. Other conspirators were nailed to camel saddles and paraded through the streets till they died. For such deeds Barkūk's lovely medresa and noble mausoleum were all too small an atonement. His savage cruelty was emulated by his successors.

Egypt indeed suffered grievously under their sway. The perpetual conflicts of the divided factions of mamluks, the street fights, the unbridled license of the dominant soldiery, produced a reign of terror. The mamûks had, of course, no bowels for the afflicted populace. They were all foreigners, though not necessarily Circassians, for Barkûk after a conspiracy among his Circassian followers, recruited his mamûks from Greek, Turkish, and Mongolian slaves. The multitude of these mercenary pests may be judged from the fact that Barkûk himself purchased 3000; and when a revolt of Bedawi and peasants in Upper and Lower Egypt was repressed by 7000 mamûks riding over the country, the horrors of the process may be left to the imagination.

So debauched were the soldiery that even under Bars-Bey, the strongest of the Circassian sultans, it was impossible to allow women to appear in the streets, wedding processions were prohibited, and women who tried to go forth to attend funerals or visit the tombs of their dead were driven back by force. The peasants often dared not bring their country produce and cattle to the Cairo markets, lest it should be seized by the mamûks, or taken by the government at a compulsory rate to supply the palace, which in Bars-Bey's time required 1200 lb of meat a day. The government was corrupt and ineffectual, justice was awarded to the highest bidder. In the reign of el-Murayyad, the very Sheykh-el-Islam, the head of the law, stole trust-money—he was a Persian from Herat and could not speak Arabic. His ignorance was exposed in a public disputation in Muayyad's mosque, and he was dismissed. In Alexandria about the same time the fisher-folk took the law into their own hands against their oppressors, they shaved one side of the deputy governor's face, like the men of Jericho, paraded him through the streets on a camel, escorted by singers and musicians, and then killed him. They made the governor himself stand naked before a judge, and beat him to death. But such successful execution of lynch-law was rare, and as a rule the people were forced to suffer without redress or vengeance. The country was frequently in revolt, especially where the Bedawi tribes were settled, and when the oppressive taxation and conscription for the wars, and the general anarchy and insecurity of life and property, often aggravated by plague and famine, drove the people to desperation ; but the rebellions only led to worse suffering, cruel reprisals, and a bloody stamping out of sedition by the implacable mamâlik. In the time of Farâq the population was said to be reduced to one third of its normal number.

The sultans were really powerless to restrain their own guards. Some of the worst excesses referred to occurred under Murâyyad Shâykhî, who was personally a devout man and a learned, a good musician, poet, and orator, scrupulous in the observance of the rules of his religion, very simple and unpretentious in his dress and mode of life, bearing himself in all religious functions as a plain Muslim among fellow worshippers and robing himself in common white wool in mourning for the pestilence that ravaged the land. He spent little on himself, but 400,000 D. on the mosque which he built on the site of a gaol where he had suffered captivity; a hospital and other institutions showed his charitable soul. But, for all this, he had no hold over the ministers or the people, and though he flogged the oppressors he could not protect the oppressed. His piety was forgotten in his indecision, and his unsuccessful currency experiments outweighed his virtues ; and when he died at the age of fifty-two, though there were over a million dinars in his treasury, he was buried without followers, without a shroud, without even a towel for the laying of the corpse. Anxiety for the succession drowned all solicitude for the dead.

A later sultan, Khûshkadam, belonging to the degenerate race of the mediaeval Greeks, frankly recognized the impossibility of restraining his own servants, and turned their corruption and violence to his personal advantage. He played off one faction against another, Zâhiris against Ashrafis, or Nâqâris against Muâyyadis, as it might happen, and thus nullifying their power, left the field free for the riotous debauchery of his own mamâlik, who murdered and ravished and plundered almost as they pleased. This crafty Greek knew how to make the most out of the mammon of unrighteousness. Official posts were openly sold; the governor of Tripolis paid 45,000 D. to be promoted to Damascus and his vacant post was purchased by another emir for 10,000 D. whilst Sased went cheap at 4000 D. Worse still, Khūshkadam took bribes from mamlūks for the privilege of torturing and killing their personal rivals. An unpopular vezir was scourged, tortured, and at last executed without trial, after his enemies had greased the sultan's palm with 75,000 D. Unquestionably he made them pay for their pleasures. When he was short of money, he would make a call in state upon some wealthy noble, and before the visit was ceremoniously completed the unlucky entertainer was handsomely fleeced.

In spite of sedition, privy conspiracy, and rebellion, in spite of frequent civil wars, constant factions, and invincible corruption, the Circassian sultans and their mamlūks evidently possessed the faculty of collective self-preservation, and knew how to keep their quarrels to themselves without letting in the foreigner. Infamous as was their government, and apparently suicidal their mutual jealousies, they were a splendid soldiery, and thus continued not only to hold Egypt, and generally Syria, for a century and a third, but to beat off one seemingly overwhelming invasion and several minor assaults. When all western Asia was trembling under the shock of Timūr's portentous conquests, the mamlūks of Egypt braved and defeated him. Yet the political situation at the time of his approach was singularly unfavourable for solid resistance. Barkük, the first of the Circassian sultans, had indeed <sup>1382</sup> Nov. deposed the last of the Bahri dynasty, the child Häggî, without difficulty, and had been accepted as sultan throughout Egypt and Syria. But a year later a conspiracy to set up the caliph Mutawakkil in his place shook his authority, and though the plot was suppressed with extreme severity, the disaffection, which had spread to north Syria grew apace. Headed by Mintâsh and Yelbughâ, the governors of Malatîya and Aleppo, and supported by the Mongols and <sup>1389</sup> Apr. Turkomans on the northern frontier, the rebels routed <sup>1390</sup> " the Egyptian army near Damascus, entered the Syrian capital, and marched upon Cairo, where Barkük, who had lost all presence of mind, after repealing all taxes, arming the raw population, barricading the streets, and entrenching the Citadel, burst into tears and took refuge in a tailor's shop.

Fig. 78.—Arms of an emir inlaid in ivory and coloured woods.

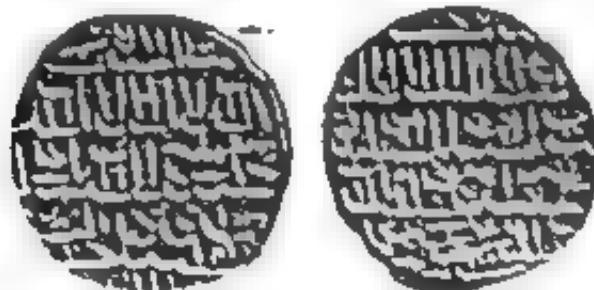

Fig. 79.—Dirh of Barkük, Aleppo, 1385.

The rebels plundered Cairo, and re-established the <sup>1390</sup> boy Häggî on the nominal throne, after which they fell out among themselves, and Mintâsh and Yelbughâ, from the roof of the mosque of sultan Hasan and the opposite battlements of the Citadel, pounded each other, and paved the way for the counter-revolution which Barkük was preparing in Syria. Escaping from the fortress of Karak <sup>1390</sup> Feb. he raised an army, discomfited the rebels near Sarkhab, took Häggî and the caliph prisoners, and entered Cairo in triumph; the garrison and people came out to welcome him, the Jews bearing their Tora and the Christians their Gospels; tapers were lighted and carpets spread in his honour. The young sultan Häggî was again deposed, but permitted to live in comfort in the Citadel till his death in 1412, in spite of the trouble he caused by his extreme brutality to his female slaves, whose shrieks he endeavoured to drown in the uproar of songs and merriment. The next two years were occupied in reducing the rebels under Mintash in Syria, and hardly was this accomplished when Timur's invasion threatened the horizon. The conqueror took Baghdad in August, 1393, overran Mesopotamia in 1394, annexing territory (such as Miridin) which owned Barkuk's suzerainty, and thus came into direct conflict with Egypt.

Fig. 80.—Pulpit (minbar) in tomb-mosque of Barkuk outside Cairo, 1401-11.

Barkuk was no valiant swashbuckler, and lived in fear of assassination, but he showed a firm front to the invader. He joined the northern prince—Burhan-ed-din of Sivas Kara-Yusuf the head of the Turkmen's of the Black Pelt, Toktamish, the khán of the Golden Horde, and Bayard, the 'Othmâniî sultan—in a general league of resistance. When Timur sent an embassy to Cairo, ostensibly to open peaceful negotiations, Barkuk, suspecting his motives, executed the envoy. Further, to show his sympathy with the victims of Timur's aggression, he invited the expelled sultan of Rûmîd Ahmed the Gâfir, to Cairo, and received him with peculiar honour. In reply to a threatening despatch from Timur, Barkuk used equally haughty language and contemptuous, compared the flowery style of the conqueror's secretary to the scraping of a bad fiddle. The army of Egypt trusted in great strength and marched through Damascus to Aleppo and to Brâ on the Euphrates, but Timur was then fully engaged in the contest with Tschirish in Georgia, and the crisis was postponed. The invasion of Syria was averted for the time, and Barkuk, who was well satisfied to see his allies attacked, and stood in far greater dread of the rising power of the 'Othmâniîs than of Timur, died without crossing swords with the enemy. He was over sixty years of age and had virtually ruled Egypt since 1378, on the whole with sagacity and mildness, despite some barbarous executions. He remitted some of the most onerous taxes, was a lover of learning, and a great builder. His tomb-mosque, with the two domes, in the eastern cemetery outside Cairo, was erected by his son Farâg (who was also buried there), but the beautiful medressa in the Beyn el-Kâgreyn, lately restored by M. Herz Bey, belongs to the early years of his reign, and testifies to his taste in art and his zeal for pious instruction.

Of Barkuk's three sons, the eldest, en-Nâsir Farâg, succeeded. His mother was a Greek, and his original name was Dulghâk, "calamity," because he was born during the rebellion of Mintâsh, but it was changed to Farâg, "deliverance," after Barkuk's victory over the rebels. Farâg was only thirteen years old, but he did not long run in leading rein. At the close of 1400 he was in Syria at the head of a great Egyptian army, Fig. 81.—Enamelled glass lamp of Barkuk in Arab Museum at Cairo.

endeavouring to check the fresh advance of Timur, who had sacked Aleppo and was threatening Damascus. At first the Egyptians seemed to be driving the invaders back, but the retreat was probably strategic; for when the Egyptians attacked they were heavily repulsed, and Farag, finding that the defeat had bred sedition among his emirs, who naturally desired a more experienced leader at such a crisis, withdrew in haste to Cairo, leaving his army to its fate. Damascus surrendered on terms, but was nevertheless sacked ruined, and burnt by the ruthless Tatars, and all northern Syria was cruelly devastated. After Timur's victorious campaign in Asia Minor, and the total defeat of the Ottoman army at the battle of Angora, Farag consented to the terms demanded by Timur's envoys, surrendered his prisoners, and even agreed to strike coins in the conqueror's name. No such coins, however, have been discovered, and Timur never entered or controlled Egypt. He died in February, 1405, whilst Farag was again raising a new army to resist any further demands.

The sultan, however, had lost his credit by these proceedings, and a struggle for power among the leading maniliks, during which he was treated with contumely, and even defeated in battle, ended in his sudden disappearance. For about two months his brother el-Mansur 'Abd-el-Aziz sat on the throne thus vacated, but by that time Farag had recovered from his panic, and was brought back to power by the emir Yeshbek. The rest of his reign was largely spent in the endeavour to restore order in Syria, which had become the cockpit of rival emirs—one of whom, Gekem, even went so far as sultan's throne. The seventh campaign ended in his deposition by the caliph. Farag surrendered to Sheykh at Damascus on a promise of his life, but the caliph to style himself el-Melik el-'Adil—but in spite of seven more or less victorious campaigns, Syria remained in a state of anarchy, and the growing power of the emirs Sheykh el-Mahmudi and Nawruz at Damascus more and more threatened the sult.

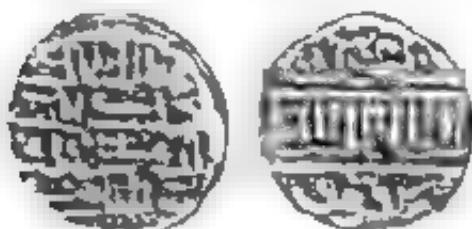

Fig. 82.—Dinar of Farag, Cairo, 1407.

and 'Uleimi decreed his death, on the ground of his notoriously debauched habits. Farāg fought his executors in vain; his body was cast upon a dung heap.<sup>1412</sup> May 28 He had been a hard drinker, and had slaughtered his mamlūks, and even slain his divorced wife with his own hands. Egypt had groaned under his taxes and his war levies. European pirates had raided Alexandria (1403) Tripolis in Syria (1404), Beyrūt and Siden; and the Ottomans were encroaching on the northern frontier.

The next five reigns made little change in the situation. The caliph Muṣṭā'īn was set up as a mere stop-gap, whilst Sheykh and Nawrūz settled which was the stronger man; and he retired willingly and with relief in less than six months, when Sheykh accepted Nov. 6 the throne, with the title of el-Mu'ayyad. The principal events of the new reign were two campaigns on the northern frontier, with a view to reducing the Turkman border states of Karamān, Dhū-l-Kadr, and Ramadān, to their former condition of vassalage. In 1418 Mu'ayyad marched upon Abulusteyn and Tarsus, and received the submission of the princes—Karamān even issuing coins in the name of the Egyptian sultan—but on his departure the Turkmans reoccupied the territory he had taken as guarantee; and accordingly in 1419 his son Ibrāhīm marched north,<sup>1419</sup> took Kayṣariya (Caesarea), Kōniya (Iconium), and Nigda, striking coins in el-Mu'ayyad's name, and appointing governors from among the cadets of the Turkman families; Erekli and Larenda (now the town of Karaman), Adhana and Tarsus, were annexed, and Ibrahim was welcomed with enthusiasm at Cairo, only to die next year, poisoned (as was rumoured) by his jealous father. Egypt, however gained little by these successes; Murayyad was unable to control the mamlūks, and the people suffered grievously. The brief reign of his son Ahmad, under the regency

Fig. 83.—Kufic inscription of el-Mu'ayyad.

<sup>1411</sup>
<sup>13</sup> Fig. 84.—Dinar of el-Murayyad, Alexandria, 1415.

<sup>Aug</sup> of Tatar, and the still briefer reign of Tatar himself, <sup>Nov</sup> followed by his son Mولى علی for a few months, under <sup>Dec</sup> the regency of Bars-Bey, ended as usual in the accession of the regent himself.

<sup>1412</sup>
<sup>Apr</sup> El-Ashrat Bars-Bey ruled for over sixteen years, and although his government was exceptionally oppressive, and Egypt groaned under his trade monopolies, the excesses of his mamlūks and the scarcity and high prices which naturally accompanied a general state of pillage and insecurity he was not only strong enough to prevent encroachments upon or revolts <sup>1424</sup> within his dominions but even achieved an extension of his power by the conquest of Cyprus. The pirates who infested the shores of Egypt and Syria, though not necessarily Cypriotes, used the harbours of Cyprus as their base, and so long as they were sheltered there it was impossible to capture them. In the summer of 1424 a few ships from Bulāk, Damietta, and Tripolis, manned by volunteers, sailed to Cyprus, sacked Limasol (Lemsün), and returned laden with prisoners and booty. Encouraged by this success, a fleet <sup>1425</sup>
<sup>Aug</sup> of forty sail was despatched from Egypt in the following year. Famagusta (Magusa) was surrendered by its Genoese garrison, Larnaka was taken, as well as Limasol, after a brief resistance, and the Egyptian admiral G'erbashi brought over a thousand captives and much spoil in triumph to Cairo.' Bars-Bey, however, had intended no such hasty return but a permanent conquest; and in the next year, rejecting the mediation of the emperor of Constantinople, he sent a larger fleet to Cyprus, manned partly by mamluks, but chiefly by voluntary adventurers and Bedawis. The new armament landed at Limasol, which fell in a few days despite its restored fortifications, and the troops marched upon Larnaka, the fleet escorting it along the coast. King James of Lusignan killed the herald sent to summon him to surrender, and advanced by sea and land against the invaders. In an engagement at Cheirocium, the Cypriotes threw away their first advantage, and the mamluks, renewing the battle, took the king and many of his knights prisoners, before the Christian fleet came up. Nikosia fell next, and the island was subdued. Cairo was <sup>in</sup> ~~in~~ <sup>Aug.</sup> on the return of the conquerors after this brief but decisive campaign.<sup>1</sup> The crown of Cyprus and the royal banners were carried in triumph through the streets, followed by a couple of thousand prisoners. King James himself entered the Citadel and was brought into the presence of the sultan, who was surrounded by a brilliant court and by the ambassadors of the Othmanli Porte, the Turkoman emirs of Asia Minor, and the representatives of the Arab tribes, the sheriffs of Mekka, and the king of Tunis. Bare-headed, and in irons, he kissed the ground before Bars-Bey, and then fainted. Pressed for a ransom, James replied, "I have nothing but my life, which the sultan may deal with as he sees fit." Threatened with death, he showed no fear. The consul of Venice and the European merchants, however, interceded, and guaranteed a ransom of 100,000 D. down, and a similar sum after return to Cyprus; and the king was set at liberty, and allowed a house and suitable provision. He rode through the capital on a splendidly caparisoned horse, visited the bazaars and churches, and finally left Egypt with the Rhodian ambassadors who had come to make a treaty with the formidable sultan who had dared to lay hands on Cyprus. An annual tribute, the amount of which is doubtful, but which probably did not exceed 5000 to 8000 ducats, was to be paid by the king as vassal of Egypt.

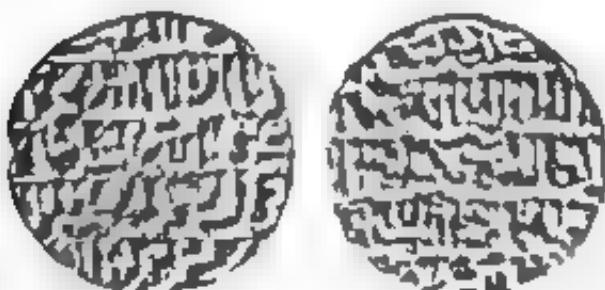

Fig. 84.—Dinar of el-Murayyad, Alexandria, 1415.

<sup>1</sup> To the credit of the sultan it must be recorded that, when the prisoners were publicly sold, he refused to allow parents and children and other near relatives to be separated. The proceeds of the sale went to the state treasury, after each adventurer had been paid 3½ or 7 D. The double sum perhaps represents the pay of a horse-soldier.

Cyprus continued to be in fief to Egypt to the end of the mamlik dynasty. When John II succeeded James in 1432 he renewed his predecessor's pledges, and a letter from the sultan Ināl to John<sup>1</sup> thanks him for the rejoicings held in Cyprus on the accession of the new ruler of Egypt, and excuses arrears of tribute. On the death of the king in 1453, Ināl supported John's natural son Jacob against his legitimate daughter Charlotte, the wife of Louis of Savoy, and sent an expedition of forty-eight ships to Cyprus to enforce his claim. The expedition was not very successful, the troops suffered from fever, and Jacob was left with a small Egyptian contingent in possession of most of the island, whilst Charlotte held out at Cerines supported by the Genoese and by the knights of Rhodes. For some time Gānt-bek el-Ablāk and the Egyptian contingent dominated over the new king, but Jacob finally got rid of them, without, however, repudiating his tribute and subjection to Khishkādām, the new sultan of Egypt.

In this connexion it may be added that Gālkānāk, envious of his predecessor Bars Bey's triumph in Cyprus, made an attempt in Aug., 1440, to capture Rhodes. Fifteen galleys sailed from Bulak, manned chiefly by volunteers, and after victualling at Cyprus proceeded to the Asiatic port of el-'Alāyā, and thence to Châteauroux, an island of the knights of St. John, which fell at once. Rhodes, however, warned by spies in Egypt, was prepared for the attack, and the knights' fleet drove away the <sup>1</sup> MM. Latré, Cypre, ii. 73. Ināl adds that he has written to the Ottoman sultan Muhammad requesting him to order the Turkish corsairs to respect Cyprus. A present of 400 pieces of stuff for the Egyptian treasury, and twenty five pieces for Ināl—perhaps in lieu of tribute—is also mentioned.

Egyptians with severe loss. The attempt was renewed more than once, and in June, 1444, a considerable armament sailed from Rū'āk, carrying 1000 of the sultan's mamlūks, besides 18,000 volunteers and recruits from Tripolis, and succeeded in effecting a landing in Rhodes, but the city itself resisted all efforts to take it, and after forty days' siege the expedition returned to Cairo in October, and peace was signed.<sup>1</sup>

The conquest of Cyprus was the sole addition made to the empire of Egypt during the rule of the Circassian mamlūks. It was not the only act that distinguished Bars-Bey's reign from the rest of the dynasty. He devoted special attention to the Indian trade, and contrived to extract more profits from it than any of his predecessors. In 1422 a new departure in the trade took place when a sea-captain from Caïnūr sailed past 'Aden—where the exactions of the Ḥusaynid kings of the Yemen had made profitable trading impossible—to Gidda, the port of Mekka. Here he found himself as badly cheated as at 'Aden, and accordingly in the following year he sailed past both 'Aden and Gidda, and sold his cargo at Dehlek and Sawakin. Still dissatisfied with his markets, in the third year he proposed to land at Yenbu', the port of Medina, which was under an Egyptian governor. This official advised the captain to try Gidda once more, and promised to protect him from extortion, and so satisfied was he with this treatment that in 1425 he convoyed fourteen vessels with rich cargoes to Gidda, and in 1426 there came to this port over forty ships from India and Persia, paying duties to the value of 70,000 D., most of which no doubt found its way to the Egyptian treasury. Not content with this, the Egyptians sought to increase their profits by sundry duties in addition to the usual tenth, and the trade began to return to 'Aden. Bars-Bey then reverted to the single tax of one tenth on all importations landed at Gidda, but doubled the duty on all goods brought from 'Aden, with a view to recovering the trade. Goods from the Rasūlid territory were even confiscated, and pilgrims had to pay customs duty on what they brought home from Mekka.

<sup>1</sup> Veret, Hist. des chev. de Malte, II. 208 ff.; Mee Latine, iii. 36, etc.

There are unfortunately no trustworthy statistics to show the results of this policy. Duties were by no means restricted to the ports of importation. There were a number of government monopolies, and all sugar, pepper, wood, metal-work, etc., had to be brought to the government warehouses, and sold at such prices as the government fixed, subject to the duty. A cargo of pepper that cost 50 D. in Cairo was sold at Alexandria to Europeans for 130 D. The Venetians remonstrated through their consul, and getting no redress, broke off relations, and ordered a fleet to Alexandria to bring off all their merchants. This brought Bars-Bey to reason, and he accorded better terms to Venice retaining only the pepper monopoly. The kings of Castile and Aragon also remonstrated, and sent crusaders to capture Egyptian shipping on the Syrian coast.

Besides interfering with trade, Bars-Bey meddled with the currency, altering the relations of gold and silver (the latter coinage was exceptionally debased under the mamlūk sultans), putting foreign money out of currency, and then re-admitting it, to the extreme annoyance and loss of the merchants. Under Gāmāk we find royal monopolies and heavy duties still in force, but the Indian import duty at Gidda was still one-tenth. Ināl attempted to reform the debased silver coinage, but his changes were not popular. The currency went from bad to worse, and as the mamlūk empire declined, and had to fight for its bare existence, the taxation became more and more onerous.

<sup>1438</sup> <sub>Jan. 7</sub> Bars-Bey died unregretted. He had been a stern and oppressive ruler, and the outward tranquillity of the realm was no proof of corresponding prosperity. His conquest of Cyprus had pleased his mamluks, and his monopolies had enriched them; but the people suffered. Egypt and Syria, says Makrizi, became deserts in his reign. One of his last acts was to order the execution of two doctors, because they could not cure him; and this in face of the urgent remonstrances of the emirs, who revered the good men. Yet he bore the character of a devout Muslim, fasted twice a week, besides five special days in the month, and delighted to hear the historian el-Ayni reading to him in Turkish of an evening. His son el-'Aziz 'Usuf, aged fourteen, soon gave place to his <sup>late</sup> regent (Nizam-el-mulk) Gâkmaç—once a slave of Bar-kuk, a lieutenant under Mu'ayyad, a colonel under Tatar, and a high minister under Bars-Bey—whose government was much compared with his predecessor's, and whose personal character was exemplary. He observed the laws of the Kula scrupulously, touched no forbidden food, prohibited wine, and suppressed profane music. His orthodoxy induced him to persecute Jews and Christians, and to enforce the old sumptuary distinctions. Unlike Bars-Bey, he was as familiar with Arabic as with Turkish, studied Arabic theology, and was fond of the society of learned men. He died at the age of about eighty, and despite his simple life he left but a trifling <sup>143</sup> fortune for his own son, the child of a Greek mother.

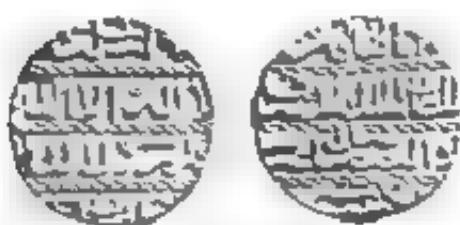

Fig. 85. Dirhams of Bars-Bey, Alexandria, 1435.

This son, e.-Mansûr 'Othmân, who was proclaimed sultan during his father's last illness, was deposed in a <sup>Nov.</sup> month and a half, by el-Ashraf Inâl, an easy-going, pliable old man who could hardly write his own name, and whose reign was embittered by the ceaseless rivalries and disorders of the mamluks. His son el-Mu'ayyad <sup>144</sup> Ahmed was totally unequal to his difficult position, and soon abdicated in favour of his governor, the Greek <sup>145</sup> Zâhir Khushkadam, whose rule was conspicuous for <sup>146</sup> successful corruption, and whose son <sup>147</sup> ez-Zâhir Yel-Bey, known as el-sirgân or "the lunatic," was as usual <sup>148</sup> dethroned in a couple of months by a faction of mamluks to make room for their candidate, another elderly Greek, <sup>149</sup> ez-Zâhir Timurbugha. The new sultan <sup>150</sup> was a highly cultivated man, versed in philology, history, theology, and he accepted the throne with much diffidence. His first steps were to set free the imprisoned emirs of various factions, as well as the ex-sultans Ahmad and 'Othmān, and to endeavour to conciliate all parties.

The result of his good intentions was that he found himself with no friends, and no money to buy them.<sup>144</sup> The mamlūks, losing all patience with so incomprehensible a chief, burst into the citadel, locked up the learned sultan, and set up Khey'r Bek with the title of el-'Ādil. Khey'r Bek, however, had only time to plunder his predecessor's harem, when a still more powerful emir, Kāit-Bey, assembled his mamlūks, ousted the usurper, and usurped the throne himself. Timurbūgha, twice deposed on the same day, was treated with the utmost consideration, and permitted to live in freedom and ease at Damietta.

El-Ashraf Kāit-Bey enjoyed the longest reign of any of the mamlūk sultans since an-Nāṣir b. Kalā'ūn. He reigned for nearly twenty-nine years, and was the most successful and warlike of all the Circassian line. He had worked his way up after the manner of the mamlūks. Bars-Bey had bought him for twenty-five guineas ( $50 D$ ); he had been resold to Gakmak, made a lieutenant by Ināl, a captain, and eventually a colonel<sup>1</sup> by Khūshkadam, until he became <sup>1</sup> These terms are here used loosely to represent the mamlūk ranks "emir of 10," "emir of 40," and "emir of 1000" horse. The ranks were not merely military, but carried with them the distinction of official nobility, like the Russian zemstvo. In Kāit-Bey's time there were but fourteen emirs of 1000; in the reign of an-Nāṣir b. Kalā'ūn there had been twenty-four. The pay of the army, on the other hand, had been constantly increasing, from 11,000 D. a month under Maṣyrād, and 18,000 D. under Bars-Bey, to 26,000 D. under Gakmak, and 46,000 D. in the earlier part of Kāit-Bey's reign. This sum, amounting to nearly £300,000 a year, was presently reduced by striking a great many inefficient or mere pensioners off the rolls. The soldiers' rations were, of course, in addition to their pay.

Fig. 86 — Dhūr of Kāit-Bey, 1468-96.

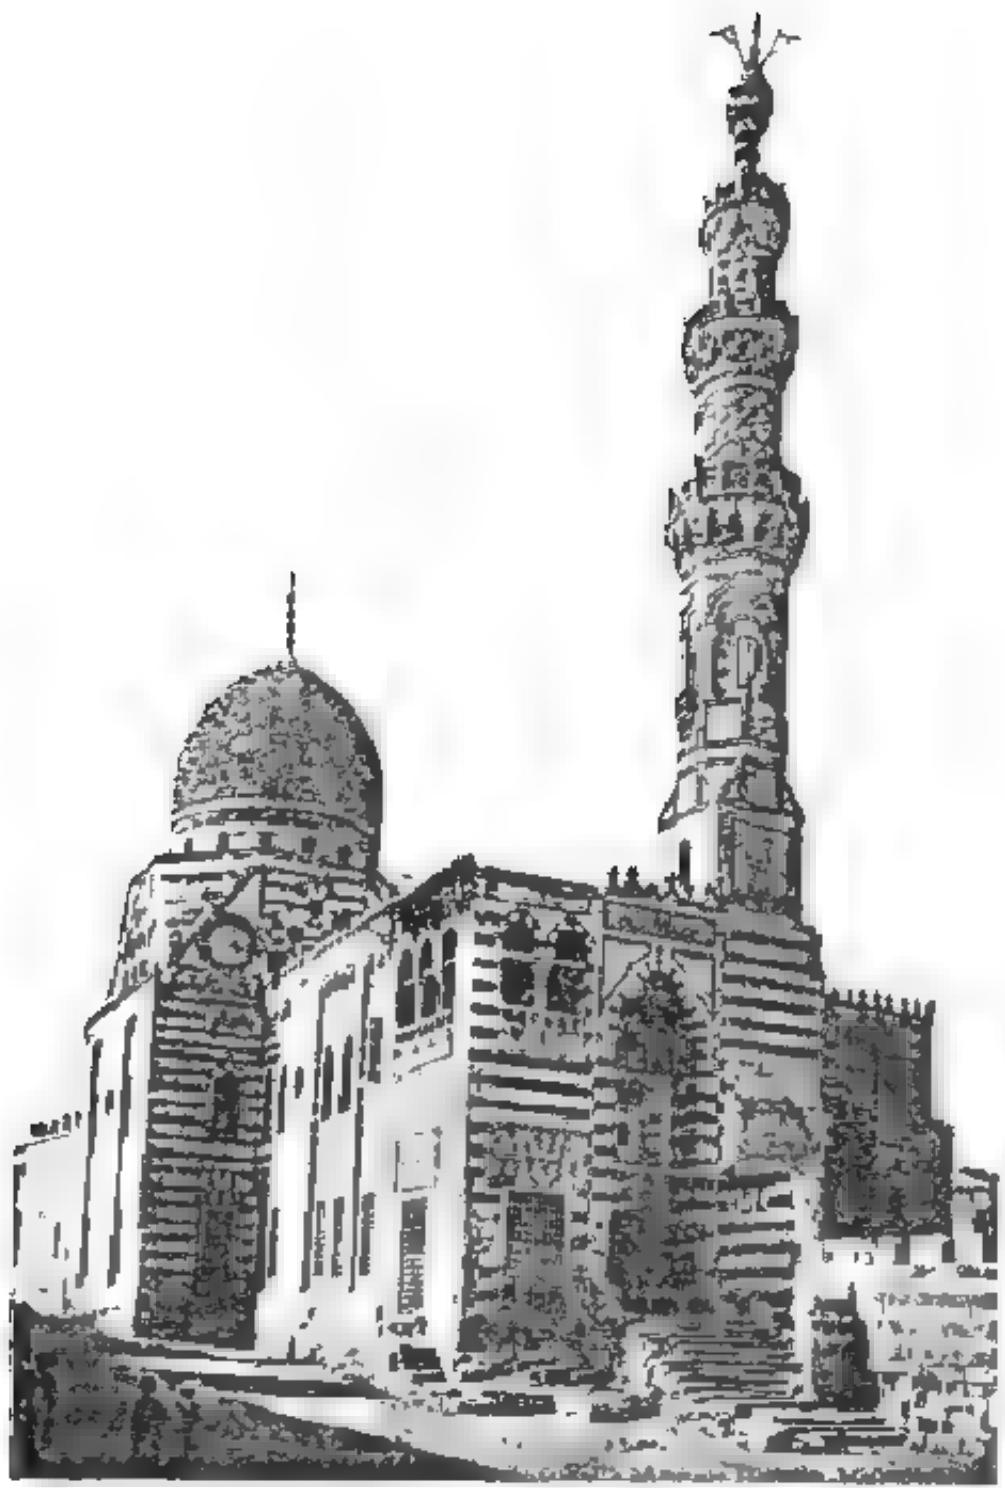

Fig. 87.—Tomb-mosque of Kait-Bey, 1474.

commander-in-chief under Timurbugha. He was an expert swordsman, and an adept at the jave in play. His career had given him experience and knowledge of the world : he possessed courage, judgment, insight, energy, and decision. His strong character dominated his mamlûks, who were devoted to him, and overawed competitors. His physical energy was sometimes displayed in flogging the president of the council of state or other high officials with his own arm, with the object of extorting money for the treasury. Such contributions and extraordinary taxation were absolutely necessary for the wars in which he was obliged to engage. Not only was the land taxed to one-tenth of the produce, but an additional tenth (half-a dirhem per ardeeb of corn) was demanded. Rich Jews and Christians were remorselessly squeezed. There was much barbarous inhumanity; innocent people were scourged, even to the death and the chemist 'Ali b. el-Mas'luh was blinded and deprived of his tongue because he could not turn dross into gold.

The sultan had the reputation of miserliness, yet the list of his public works, not only in Egypt but in Syria and Arabia shows that he spent the revenue on admirable objects. His two mosques at Cairo, and his wekâ'as or caravanserais are among the most exquisite examples of elaborate arabesque ornament applied to the purest Saracenic architecture. He diligently restored and repaired the crumbling monuments of his predecessors, as numerous inscriptions in the mosques, the schools, the Citadel, and other buildings of Cairo abundantly testify. He was a frequent traveller, and journeyed in Syria, to the Euphrates, in Upper and Lower Egypt, besides performing the pilgrimages to Mekka and Jerusalem ; and wherever he went he left traces of his progress in good roads, bridges, mosques, schools, fortifications, or other pious or necessary works. No reign, save that of an-Nâṣir b. Kâlîlân, in the long list of mamlûk sultans, was more profuse in architectural construction or in the minor industries of art. The people suffered for the cost of his many buildings, but a later age has recognized their matchless beauty.

Kāit-Bey, however, had more serious matters to deal with than architectural achievements. The northern frontier of Syria had long been a thorn in the side of the mamlūk sultans, not only on account of the chronic insubordination or revolutions among their Turkmān vassals, but because these disturbances constantly furnished a pretext for intervention on the part of their most dangerous neighbour the 'Othmāni sultan, whose power was soon to be crowned by the conquest of Constantinople Mu'ayyad and his son had more than once reduced the troublesome border states to temporary submission. Bars-Bey had waged war with the Turkmans of the White Pelt (1433), and even laid siege to their city of Amid in Diyar-Bekr, without success. Gâşmak had cultivated the friendship of the border chieftains, married their daughters, and received their homage, at least in form; and his conciliatory policy towards the border Turkmans as well as towards the 'Othmânîs had been continued by Inâl, who decorated

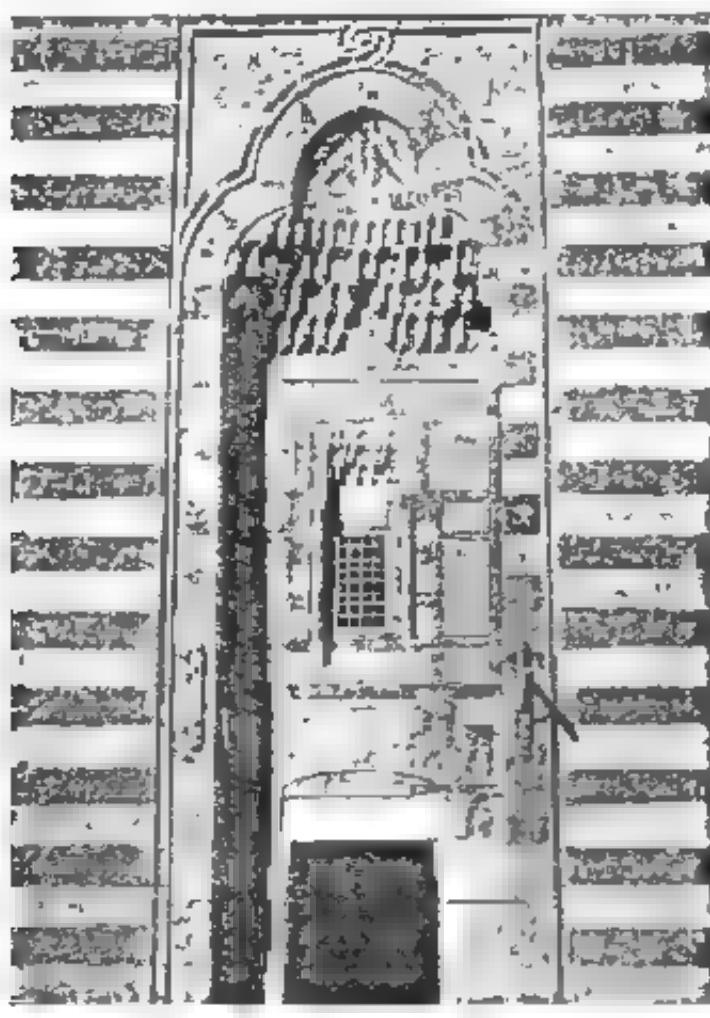

Fig. 105.—Door of mosque of Kāit-Bey, 1474.

Fig. 89.—Wekâ'a or caravanserai of Kâit-Bey, 1477, near Azhar

Cairo for several days in 1453, when an embassy from Mohammad II brought the news of the conquest of Constantinople, and who maintained a friendly, if nominal, overlordship over the chief of the White Pelt and the Dhû-l-Kadr prince of Abulastevn, though he had to send an army (1456-7) to recover Tarsus and Adhana from Ibrâhim, the ambitious prince of Karamân. The vassalage of the chiefs of the White Pelt, however, became merely ludicrous when Uzûn Hasan adopted the device of capturing Egyptian cities and fortresses (such as Karkar and Khartibit), and pretending that he made it all correct by sending the keys to Cairo!

There were signs, moreover, that the 'Othmânlis were not anxious for the friendship of Egypt. An embassy from Mohammad II in 1464 pointedly disregarded some of the customary etiquette. In a dispute over the succession to the principality of Karamân, the Porte and Egypt took opposite sides and nearly came to blows, and in another dispute between two brothers for the state of Dheâl-Kadr—which was technically tributary to Egypt—the Porte secretly supported Shâh Siwâr, the candidate whom Egypt opposed, and the mamlûks were defeated <sup>1464</sup> with heavy loss at 'Ayn-Tab, and later on near the river <sup>1464</sup> Geyhûn. Eventually, deprived of Turkish support, the rebel was forced to surrender, brought to Cairo, and hanged; but the course of the war had shown the danger of 'Othmânli intervention. Üzün Hasan continued his policy of pretended vassalage to Kait-Bey, sending him presents of camels and coats of mail and Circassian slaves, but so long as he persisted in keeping the fortresses and giving his suzerain only the keys, his career of aggrandisement gave Kait-Bey no little anxiety, and the defeat of his "vassal" by Mohammad II of Turkey was looked upon with some satisfaction.

All these minor contests proved the growing power and interference of the Ottoman Porte, and, if occasion were needed for a rupture, it was certain that it would easily be found in some border dispute. Kait-Bey went out of his way to invite a quarrel, however, when he welcomed the exiled prince G'era (Djem), brother and rival of the new sultan of Turkey, Bayezid II, and not only treated him

Fig. 90.—Arms of Kait-Bey.

Google

with royal honours at Cairo, but supplied him with means for a fruitless rising in Asia Minor. When the unlucky exile was made the cat's-paw of the European powers, Kāit-Bey played his part in the ignoble tragedy, and negotiated with the pope for the surrender of so valuable a possession as the heir to the 'Othmānī throne,<sup>1</sup> until finding it hopeless to extricate such a prize from Christian toils, he set about conciliating the offended brother at Constantinople.

Bāyezid at first rejected all overtures, and invaded Cilicia, taking Tarsus and Adhana; but, when in several engagements, the mamlūks, under the emir Ezbek, had the better fortune, whilst Matthias Corvinus was threatening in Hungary, and Gem, the source of all these contests, was still alive at Rome, the Porte thought better of the overtures of peace which Kāit-Bey, weary of these expensive campaigns, renewed. The first envoy, <sup>1401</sup> Māmidy, was imprisoned; but the second, the emir Gānbalāt b. Yeshbek, managed to reach Bāyezid's ear, and peace was concluded on the Turks restoring the keys of the fortresses they had seized.

The last years of Kāit-Bey's reign were clouded, not only by the heavy taxation and consequent discontent due to the war, but also by an exceptionally virulent <sup>1492</sup> plague, which carried off 12,000 persons in a single day in Cairo, killed a third of the mamlūks, and bereaved the sultan himself of his only wife and a daughter on the same day. The plague was followed by scarcity and from a lamp.

<sup>1</sup> See Thunne, Djems Sultan, ch. ii, and pp. 254, 281, etc.; Weil, v. 345, note.

Fig. 91.—Arms of Kāit-Bey.

cattle disease; and to add to the general misery, a fierce contest broke out between two great divisions of the <sup>451</sup> mamlûks. The aged sultan displayed his standard at the Citadel gate, beat to quarters, and quelled the riot for the moment, but the intrigues and jealousies continued, and at length Kait-Bey, overcome by years (he was over eighty), and illness and worry, abdicated in favour of his son, and died the day after.

Fig. 92.—Arms of emir Balch, on his mosque, 1495.

After the brief reigns of Kait-Bey's cruel and incapable son, en-Nâṣir Mohammad (7 Aug., 1496—31 Oct., 1498); of el-Zâhir Kânûh (2 Nov., 1498—28 June, 1500); el-Ashraf Gân-balât (30 June, 1500—25 Jan., 1501); and 1500-25 Jan., 1501), and el-Adil Tumān-Bey (Jan. 20 April, 1501), who were all at the mercy of the turbulent mamlūks, el-Ashraf Kānūn el-Ghūrī, a vigorous old man of sixty, once a slave of Kāit-Bey's, was elected to the throne, and quickly proved that age had not abated his natural strength of character. He restored order in the distracted metropolis at once, placed men whom he could trust in office, and set to work to replenish the empty treasury.

Never had such drastic measures been known. He levied ten months' taxes at a stroke, laying not only the lands and shops and the other usual sources under contribution, but also the mills, water-wheels, boats, beasts of burden, Jews, Christians, palace servants, and even the wakfs or pious endowments. He imposed heavy customs duties, and mulcted the next of kin of the greater part of their inheritance. He still further debased the coinage for the benefit of the treasury and to the injury of the merchant. The result was a handsome revenue at the cost of the impoverishment and discontent of the people. El-Ghūrī spent his money on his mamlūks, whose number he increased by purchase; on building his mosque and college in the street of Cairo named after him the Ghūriya ; on improving the pilgrims' road to Mekka, erecting rest-houses and digging wells ; on making canals, aqueducts, fortifications at Alexandria and Rosetta, restoring the Citadel of Cairo, and generally improving the public works of the country. He also kept great state at court ; his horses, jewels, table equipage, and kitchen were sumptuous and splendid ; and though he was niggard and heartless enough to cut off the pensions of orphans, he could be princely in his presents to poets and musicians.

Beyond a few military cinctures and Bedawi risings,

Fig. 93.—Inscription of Tūmā-Bey I in Citadel of Cairo, 1500.

there were few events to disturb the earlier years of his reign. The chief expeditions were to the Red Sea, where a new and formidable rival had appeared, who threatened to destroy the Indian transit trade which brought so much wealth to Egypt. Vasco da Gama had rounded the Cape of Good Hope in 1497, and the Portuguese had established themselves at Calicut in 1500. The trade which went to Egypt by way of Aden and G'dda and Sawākin was being diverted to the Cape route to Europe, and Egyptian ships, or ships trading to the Red Sea, were being seized by the Portuguese.

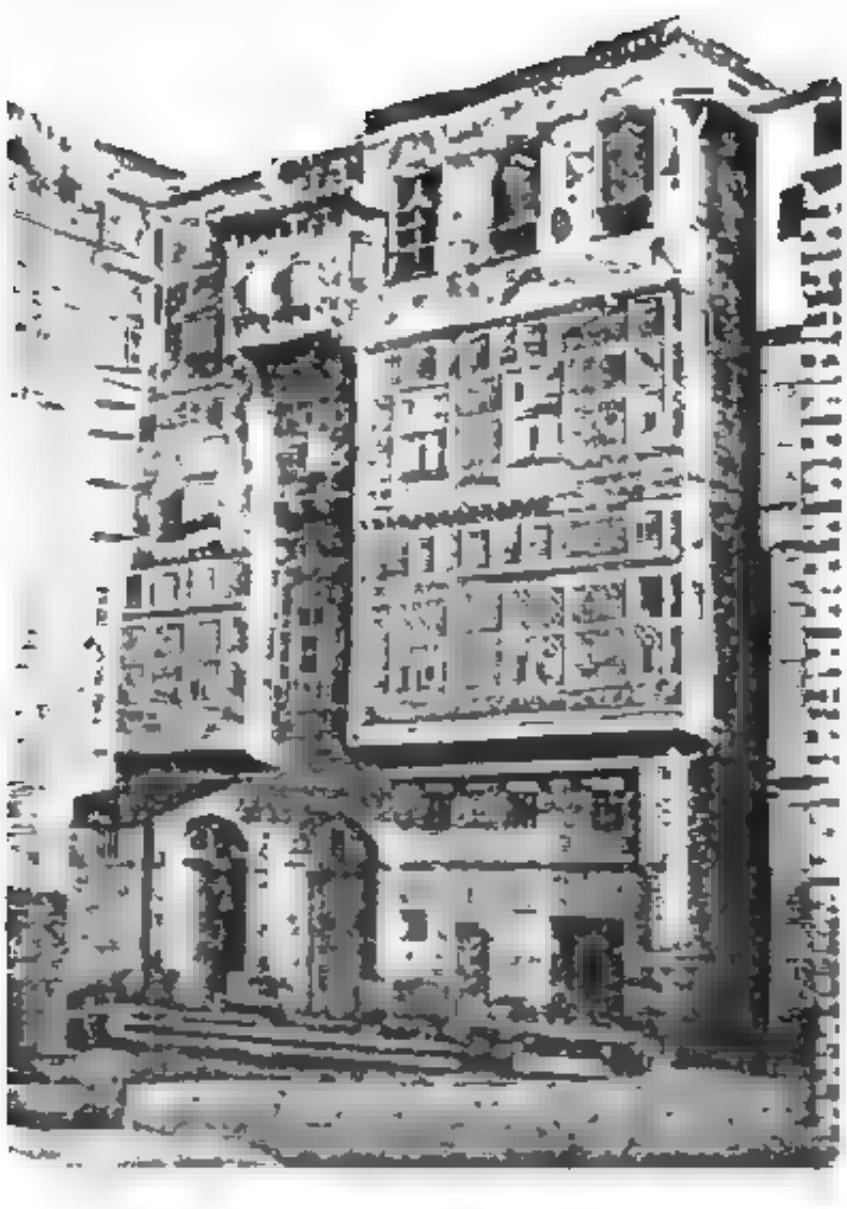

Fig. 94.—Sixteenth century house at Rotella.

Ghūrī was entreated by the king of Gużarāt and the other Muhammadan rulers of India and southern Arabia to come to the rescue; and the importance of the menaced trade was an argument quite strong enough to move him. He first tried a diplomatic appeal to the pope to check the outrages of the Spaniards and Portuguese upon the Muslims both west and east, and threatened to destroy the holy places of Palestine if these persecutions and depredations continued. The European powers rightly judged that this was but an idle threat, and took no notice of it. Ghūrī then built a new fleet in the Red Sea, and his admiral Ḥoseyn encountered the Portuguese off Chaul, and defeated it, with the loss of the flagship and its admiral,

<sup>152</sup> Lorenço, son of Almeida. The Portuguese, however, had their revenge at Diu in the following year; Albuquerque attacked 'Aden in 1513; the Egyptian carrying trade with India was doomed, but the manuk dynasty was doomed too.

<sup>153</sup> So long as Bāyezid II was sultan of Turkey it was possible to temporize; but when his warlike and ambitious son Selim I succeeded, in 1512, the long-impending catastrophe could no longer be averted. After the defeat of Ismā'il, the first shah of the new Ṣafavid dynasty of Persia, at the battle of Chaldirān in 1514, Selim turned southwards towards Syria and Egypt.

<sup>154</sup> He seized the border state of Dhū-l-Kadr, then tributary to Egypt, and sent its ruler's head to Cairo, although Egypt and Turkey were still at peace with one another. The annexation of Diyār-Bekr brought the 'Othmānlis into close contact with the Egyptian frontiers in Syria and on the Euphrates, and Selim continued to mass troops on the border. His grievances against Ghūrī were trifling: the sultan of Egypt had allowed the enemies of Turkey and even fugitive princes of the 'Othmānli house to pass through or take refuge in his territories; he was believed to be in secret communication with shāh Ismā'il of Persia; he had not commanded his vassal of Dhū-l-Kadr to support the Turks in their campaign against the Persians. But Selim was not the man to wait for a sir rāsūl belli; he had resolved to conquer Egypt, and no question of right would stand in his way.

Fig. 95.—Dinars of al-Ghūrī,
Cairo, 1508.

Kāngūl el-Ghūrī had missed his opportunity; he should have joined forces with shāh Ismā'il in 1514, when the battle of Khaldīrān might have had a different issue. He was over seventy years old, however, and his energies were failing. In May, 1516 too late, he left Cairo at the head of his army. Of the twenty six colonels (or emirs of 1000) of the Egyptian establishment, fifteen accompanied him to Syria, and the number of his personal following of mamlūks is variously estimated at 5000 to 14,000 horsemen. What was the total force under his command is not recorded, but it included the levies of Egypt and Syria and the Bedawī tribes. In June he made a triumphal entry into Damascus, and thence marched north to Aleppo. He received two embassies from Selim, assuring him of his goodwill and repeating that the Turks were mustering against Persia, not against Egypt; but Ghūrī was not convinced, and when an embassy he sent to Selim

<sup>1516</sup>
May

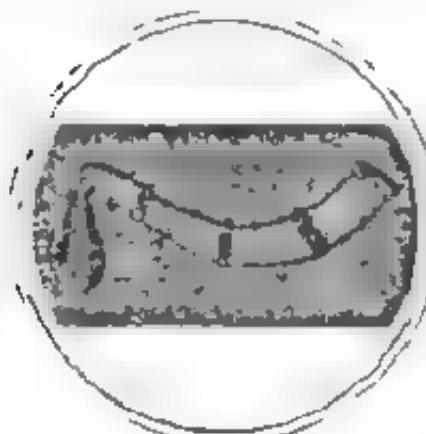

Fig. 96.—Arms of commandant Akūh, c. 1516.

in reply was grossly and contemptuously outraged by the Turkish sultan, there was no longer any room for doubt as to his intentions. The two armies met on the plain called Marg Dibk, a little north of Aleppo, on Sunday, the 24th of August, 1516, and despite the bravery of the Aug mamlūks, the Egyptian army suffered a total defeat: the superior numbers and the artillery of the Turks, aided by the jealousy of some of the troops, and the treachery of Kheyr Beg, who had been won over by Selim and now deserted with the left wing of the army, after spreading a rumour that Ghūrī was killed, completely routed the Egyptians, and they fled from the field. Their sultan was indeed dead, and they had no leader.

In Cairo, Tūmān-Bey, the viceroy, a slave of Ghūrī's was elected sultan as soon as the news was known of his

Fig. 97.—Bāb-al-Azab, Gate of the Citadel of Cairo, 15th century.

<sup>1516</sup> master's death. He accepted the office with reluctance, <sup>Oct.</sup> and only after the sheykh Abū Su'ud had pledged the <sup>17</sup> emirs to absolute loyalty. A letter from Selim arrived, proposing to recognize him as viceroy of Egypt, if he would acknowledge the sultan of Turkey on the coinage and in the prayers. Tūmān-Bey was not indisposed to accept these terms, but the mamlūk emirs compelled him to refuse, and the Turkish envoys were killed. There is no doubt that the mass of the Egyptians regarded the Ottoman conquest as a certainty not to be resisted. <sup>1517</sup> The Turks were soon upon them. On 22 Jan. they defeated the Egyptian army outside Cairo, and on the next day Selim was prayed for in all the mosques of Cairo. On the 26th, Selim himself entered Cairo in state, accompanied by the captive caliph. The brief resistance of the mamluks was overcome; and Túman-Bey was betrayed, and hanged at the Zawila gate (14 April). The caliph Mutawekkil, last of the 'Abbasid caliphs of Egypt, was carried off to Constantinople and imprisoned; but after the death of Selim (Sept., 1520), Fig. 98.—Coin of sultan Suleyman I of Turkey, Migr 1520.

Süleyman the Great set the caliph free and allowed him to return to Cairo soon afterwards, where he died in 1538, after bequeathing his title and rights to the sultan of Turkey. The legality of the inheritance is repudiated, not only by the Shi'a, but by the majority of learned Sunnis, who are aware that a caliph must belong to the Prophet's tribe of Kureysh; but whatever they may be de jure, the sultans of Turkey have been de facto caliphs of the greater part of orthodox Islam ever since the death of Mutawekkil.

After the 'Ottoman' conquest, Egypt sank into the position of a mere province of the Turkish empire, and was separated from the neighbouring provinces of Syria and Arabia.<sup>1</sup> The traitor Kheyr Bek was the first governor under the new régime. But the power of the mamluks was not extinguished, and as time went on the authority of the Turkish pasha, supported by his janizaries, shrank before the reviving strength of the mamluks, headed by their chief emir, who was known as the sheykh-el-beled, or mayor. One of the sheykhs, 'Ali Bey, in the eighteenth century, supported by a large force of valiant mamluks, and by the sympathy of the population, expelled the Turkish pasha, proclaimed the independence of Egypt (1768), subdued part of Arabia, and attempted to annex Syria. He was, however, betrayed, defeated, and killed by his favoured general Mohammad Abé-Dhahab (1772). The leading mamlūks fought over the government of Egypt, subject, more or less, to the Porte, until Napoleon's invasion and victory at the battle of Embāba or "the Pyramids" (July 21, 1798) converted Egypt for three years into a province of France. The British naval victory of the Nile, fought in the bay of Abū-kir (Aug. 1, 1798) and the battle of

<sup>1</sup> The history of Egypt under the 'Ottoman' Turks, and its development under the Khedives guided by French and latterly English influence, form a subject for a separate volume.

Fig. 99.—Sigirtulik of Ali Bey, Mameluke, 1769.

Fig. 100.—The Citadel of Cairo in 1859.

Alexandria (March 21, 1801), forced the French to evacuate the country (Sept.), and the authority of the Porte was restored. The perpetual jealousies of the mamlūks and their contests with the Turkish pasha were brought to an end when Muhammad 'Ali expelled the pasha (1805), massacred the leading mamlūks (1805 and 1811), and established the dynasty of viceroys or khedives which is still upon the throne of Egypt.

•

INDEX

'Abd-al-'Afi, Tikhān, 275, 279, 280
 'Abd-al el Balkhi, governor, 55 el-'Abdās, regicide, 271, 272, 273 el-'Abdās b. 'Abd-er-Rahmān, marshal, 51 el-'Abdās b. Lahī'a, marshal, 55 el-'Abdās b. Mu'ād, governor, 55 el-'Abdās, son of Isha-Tūlū, 63
 el-'Abdās 76, 258
 'Abdāsul caliphs of Baghdad 30, 35, 138, 257 260; proclamations at Cairo 193; Black robes of 193;
     robes and throne at Cairo 139
 'Abdāsul caliphs of Cairo 264, list 265; 287, 291, 305, 355
 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd-el-Melik, gov., 46
 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd-er-Rahmān, gov., 51
 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd-er-Rahmān b.
     Hudeyf, marshal, 49, 50; vice-
     governor, 50
 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr, governor, 45
 'Abdātib b. Beshshār, marshal, 48
 'Abdallāh b. Huqeyra, kādi, 47
 'Abdallāh b. Kays, vice-gov., 45
 'Abda'ib b. Lahī'a, kādi, 40, 51
 'Abdallāh b. el-Mo'izz, 113, 114
 'Abdallāh b. el-Mughira, marshal, 49
 'Abdallāh b. el-Nusayyab, gov.,
     53; vice-governor 53
 'Abdallāh b. Sa'd, general, 15;
     governor 20-23, 46
 'Abdallāh b. Sumeyr, marshal, 48
 'Abdallāh b. Tāhir, governor, 36, 56
 'Abdallāwi melons 37
 'Abdaweyh b. C'ebela, marshal and
     governor, 56
 'Abd-el-'Afi b. Khālid, marshal and kādi, 47
 'Abd-el-'Afi b. Sa'd, marshal, 51
 'Abd-el-'Aziz, el-Mansūr, Marginal-tan, 354; inscription, 323
 'Abd-el-'Aziz b. Marwan, governor, 26, 46
 'Abd-el-Bisit, medresa, 323
 'Abd-el-Ghāfi, medresa, 323
 'Abd-el-Hakam, Ibn-, 13, 19, 20;
     Muhammad ibn, 65
 'Abd-el-Latīf 12, 214, 215
 'Abd-el-Mekk b. Kifū'a, gov., 47, 48
 'Abd-el-Melik, Omayyad caliph, 26
 'Abd-el-Melik b. Marwān, treasurer and governor, 49
 'Abd-el-Melik b. Sālib, gov., 53
 'Abd-el-Melik b. Yazid, gov., 29
 'Abd-el-Wāhid b. Yahyā, gov., 57
 'Abd-er-Rahmān b. 'Abdallāh, 441, 54
 'Abd-er-Rahmān b. 'Amr, vice-
     governor, 46
 'Abd-er-Rahmān, heir of Hākim, 134
 'Abd-er-Rahmān b. Huqeyra, treas.
     and kādi, 46
 'Abd-er-Rahmān b. Khālid, marshal, 48; governor, 48
 'Abd-er-Rahmān b. Nasīma, marshal, 52
 'Abd-er-Rahmān b. Mo'iwyā, marshal and kādi, 41
 'Abd-er-Rahmān b. Mu'ād, marshal,
     52; vice-governor, 54
 'Abd-er-Rahmān b. 'Otbā, gov., 46
 'Abd-er-Rahmān b. Sālim, kādi,
     49; treasurer, 50
 'Abdūn, Ibn-, wazir 128
 'Abū, marshal and kādi, 46
 'Abū, queen of Fāris, 255
 Abu-'Abdallāh esh-Shī'i, 93, 96

Abū-'Afl "Katīlīt" vezir, 167
 Abū-'Awī, governor, 31, 50
 Abū-Bekr b. Ḡūnādā, marshal, 55
 Abū-Bekr b. Mu'āz-z, medresa, 323
 Abū-l-Farāg 12
 Abū-l-Fidā 136, 226, 255, 259, 272, 298, 312, 313
 Abū-Kalīfā, treasurer, 31
 Abūl-usteyn 270, 335, 346
 Abū Maryam 5
 Abū-Miyyāmīn (Benjamin) 2
 Abū-Naqāb b. Kennā, monk, 166
 Abū-Rakāmīk, poet, 187
 Abū-Rakwā, rebel, 128, 129
 Abū-Sa'īd, Ikhān, 307
 Abū-Sa'īd of Tuṣṭar, 137, 148
 Abū-Salīḥ 6, 26, 36, 119, 327, 351,
     152, 169, 170, 197, 205
 Abū-Sāliḥ see Menūdīl
 Abū-Sayfayn, ch., 219
 Abū-Su'īd, sheykh, 354
 Abū-Yezīd, rebel, 98
 Abyāz 149
 Abyssinians 57, 272, 310
 Abyssinians' Lake 140, 183 el-'Adawiya convent 170
 'Aden 197, 339, 352
 Adhāna 66, 70, 336, 346, 348 el-'Āqīd, Fātimid caliph, 170, 176, 181, 193, 200
 el-'Adīl, Ayyūbīd, 203, 212-221 ;
     inscription, 212
 el-'Adīl II, Ayūbīd, 230, 240, 257, casket, 230
 el-'Ādīl Ruzzīk, vezir, 176
 el-'Ādīl, see Ketbughā, Selāmīsh
 Adjutant-general 246, 248
 Administration, provincial, 18-20, 25 ff.; Fātimid, 156, 157
 el-Afdal, son of Salādīn, 213-215
 el-Afdal, vezir, 131, 154, 161-165
 Aftegīn 114, 120, 158
 Agdābiya 107
 Aghlabids 68, 80, 95
 Ahmad Abū-l-Fawārī, Ikhshīdīd, 89
 Ahmad, G'elāir, 332
 Ahmad Khān 280
 Ahmad, el-Mu'ayyad, Burjī sultan,
     341, 342
 Ahmad, el-Muqaffār, Burjī sultan, 336
 Ahmad el-Wāṣīlī, secretary, 61
 Ahmad b. Ismā'īl, governor, 54
 Ahmad b. Keyghālāgh, gov., 79
 Ahmad b. Khālid, treasurer, 57
 Ahmad b. Mu'ādhībūr, treasurer, 57,
     58, 61, 66, 67, 71
 Ahmad b. Mūsī, marshal, 54
 Ahmad b. Mu'āz-z, governor, 53
 Ahmad b. Tūlūn see Tūlūn
 'Akāka 192
 Akībūghā, medresa, 276
 el-Akkādīr b. Marwān, marshal, 51
 'Akka (Acre) 150, 151, 161, 163,
     165 ; siege of 209-211 ; 217, 218,
     227, 228, 239, 263, 267, 269, 279,
     282, 285-7 ; gate at Cairo 302
 Akkar 269
 el-'Alīnār, mosque, 177, 189 el-'Alīnār, mosque at Jerusalem, see Haram
 Al-eunkur, emir, 318 ; mosque, 276,
     314
 Alī'lī, Fāriy-ed-dīn, 243, 257-260 el-'Alī b. 'Aṣmī, vice-governor, 54
 'Alī-ed-dīn b. Kalā'īn, 284
 Alamūt 162
 'Alawīs see 'Alīds el-'Alīyā 338
 Albuquerque 352
 Aleppo 54, 85, 87, 88, 158, 159,
     160, 174, 199, 200, 206, 213, 215,
     229, 256, 295, 297, 306, 330, 332,
     333, 353 ; inscriptions 277, 324
 Alexandria 1, 6, 7, 8-17, 20, 21, 23,
     30, 35, 36, 38, 41, 49, 61, 62, 65,
     78, 80, 81, 83, 98, 101, 102, 107,
     112, 151, 155, 157, 162, 182, 183,
     188, 204, 216, 272, 316, 320, 327,
     335, 350 ; library 12 ; Norman siege 198 ; trade 218, 240, 303, 304, 340 ; Kā'īt-Bey's castle 323-4
 'Ali, fourth caliph, 24, 31
 'Ali Bey, rebel, 355
 'Ali, el-Manṣūr, Balyī sultan, 261
 'Ali b. el-Faḍl, marshal and vice-
     governor, 53
 'Ali Abū-l-Ilāsām, Ikhshīdīd, 86, 87
 'Ali b. el-Manhūshī, chemist, 344

'Ali b. Mohammad, 'Alid, 32
 'Ali b. el-Muthanna, marshal, 54
 'Ali b. Suleyhb, k. of Yemen, 138
 'Ali b. Sulaymān, governor, 52
 'Ali b. Vahyā, Armenian gov., 57
 'Alids 31, 52, 61, 92 ff.
 Alliances with Christians 180, 281 :
     see France
 Almás, emir, mosque, 276
 Alves 141, 147
 Alum quarries 304
 'Alwa 22
 Amalric, k. of Jerusalem, 17, 176-
     185, 199
 Amalric of Lusignan, k. of Cyprus,
     217, 218
 Ambassadors at Cairo, 180, see Envoys
 Amber 165
 Anisergis 122, 141
 Anul 229, 340
 el-Amīn, 'Abdāsīd caliph, 33
 el-Amīr, Fātimid caliph, 152, 164-166, 170
 'Amār b. Muālim, marshal, 52, 53
 'Amāt, Ibn-, 107, 124, 125
 'Amr b. el-'Āṣ, conqueror and governor of Egypt, 1-21, 23, 24,
     26, 45 ; mosque at Fustat, 17, 32,
     73, 103, 132, 156, 204, 302
 'Amr b. Ma'ādī Karka, sword of, 143
 'Amr b. Sa'īd, marshal, 46
 'Amr b. Shurāḥil 23
 Anas, tomb of, 323
 'Anbas b. Ishaq, gov., 40, 41, 42, 57
 Andalusian immigrants 35, 36
 Angora, battle, 334
 Anjou, Charles of, 266
 Anne, ch. of St., Jerusalem, inser., 191
 Antætūs (Antætus) see Tortosa
 Antioch 66, 70, 158, 163, 208, 217,
     227, 266-9
 Antshiegīn ed Dizberī, governor of Syria, 159, 160
 Apamea (Fāniya) 266
 Aqueducts 65, 117, 203, 276, 316, 323
 Arab conquest of Egypt 1-13 ; invasions of Nubia 35, 31-33, 41, 42 ; tribes in Egypt 28, 29, 31,
     33-35, 38, 43, 101, 106, 113, 141,
     173, 259, 260, 300, 320, 327 ;
     Arab troops 243, 276-280, 337,
     353
 Arabia 118, 138, 197, 207, 215,
     272, 308, 310
 Arabic in public documents 27
 Aragon 206, 310, 340
 el-A'rāq or U'eyrig 5
 Araucaria 308
 Arbalesteer 262, 263
 Arch, pointed, 63, 65
 Archer, T. A., 287
 Archery 250
 Architecture 63, 65, 111, 123, 152,
     153, 189, 201, 203, 204, 314, 315,
     326, 344
 Ardebbi = 5 bushels, 6, 24
 'Ard-el-Tabbāla 139
 Argawāsh, gov. of Damascus, 297
 Argūn, murewa of emir, 276
 Argūz b. Ulagh Tarkhān, marshal and governor, 58
 el-'Arish, frontier town, 2, 13, 79, 83, 161, 259
 'Artu 267
 Armenia, Lesser, see Cilicia
 Armenians 57, 150, 151, 162, 168,
     237, 274, 279
 Armenosa 3
 Armour 122 ; armour-bearer 247
 Army 2, 7, 20, 83, 85, 154, 155, 342
 Arsūf 210, 267
 Art 111, 112, 188, 314, 315, 326 see
     Architecture
 Artabūn 5
 Artin Pasha, xi, Coll. of Coins, 55
 Artina 310
 Arundel, earl of, 222
 Asad-ed-din 186
 Asal-Bey, mosque in Fayyūm
     (1499) 323
 Ascalon 155, 158, 164, 165, 173,
     204, 210, 230, 231
 Ashfūn 38
 Ashnās, bēlēe, 30, 56
 el-Ashraf Sha'bān, Bājirī sultan, mosque, 276
 el-Ashraf Mūsā, Ayyūnid, 257-259

el-Ashraf Mūsā, son of el-'Adil, Ayyūbīd, 229
 el-Ashraf, see Bars-Bey, Ghūrī, Ināl, Kāt-Bey, Khalīl el-'Askar, official capital, 31, 63
 'Aslūq, official, 114
 Aslūn Khātūn, wife of Kālārūn, 288, 289
 'Assāma b. 'Amr, marshal, 51, 52; governor 52; vice-governor 52
 Assassins (Ismā'īlīans) 162, 166, 199, 270
 Asses 127, 141; as food 146
 Astrology 103, 169
 Awān 22, 23, 41, 67, 151, 271, 308
 Asyūt 4, 112
 'Atā b. Shurahbīl, treasurer, 50
 Atābeg el-'Aṣakir 247, 256
 Atābegs of Mosul, see Zengids
 Atīfīh 179
 Atharib 174
 el-'Athīr, Ibn-, 46, 47, 182, 240
 Athribis 9
 Atlantic reached by Fātimids 99, 100, 123
 Atlas satm 165, 280
 Atsız, Seljuk general, 161
 'Attābi (taby) cloth 122
 Augustamnica 6
 Aviary 74
 'Awf b. Wuheyb, vice-governor, 54
 'Awn b. Wahlī, vice-governor, 53
 Aybek, el-Mo'izz, Bahri sultan, 256-260
 Aydekin, emir, 263
 'Aydhab, Red Sea port, 41, 155, 271, 304
 'Ayn-Gālūd 262
 'Ayn-Tāb 347
 el-'Aynī, historian, 341
 Ayyāb 191; Ayyūbids 212-241, 257, 260-262, 272, 278
 Ayyūb see also Shalih
 Ayyūb b. Shurahbīl, governor, 47
 Azhar mosque and university, 104, 117, 188, 189, 196, 242, 302, 324 el-'Azīz, Fātimid caliph, 112, 118, 123, 139, 142, 147, 158, 159 el-'Azīz, son of Saladin, 213, 214, 217 el-'Aziz see Yūsuf el-'Aziz, Ibn-, painter, 112
 "BA'ALBEKK 213, 229; inscr. 277 el-Bābān (Balbein) 181, 191
 Bib-el-Futūḥ, "Gate of Conquests," 117, 152
 Bāb-en-Naṣr, "Gate of Victory," 117, 152, 201
 Bāb-Zawīla (Zuwayla), 117, 152, 172, 175, 178, 196
 Bābshād, Ibn-, 149, 187
 Babylon of Egypt (Kaṣr-es-She'ma'), 3, 4, 8, 9, 13, 17, 20, 301
 Badges of monks 27
 Boğa race in Sūdān 41
 Baghdad 149, 160, 261, 265, 331, 332; recognizes Fātimid caliph 138, 139; acknowledges sovereignty of Egypt, 307, 320; see also 'Abhāsids
 Bābū-ed-dīn Zuheyr, poet, 220, 240, 251-252
 Bahrīm, vezir, 168
 Bahr-eş-Şugheyyir (Uşümüñ canal) 233
 Bahri Mamlūks 243-322
 Bağbāk, sieffee, 30, 58, 61, 62
 Bakṭ (tribute of slaves) 22, 23, 171, 182, 271
 Balātūnus inscription, 277
 Barban, emir, 257
 Baldwin I, k. of Jerusalem, 164, 165; Baldwin IV 199, 205, 226; Baldwin V 207 el-Bākhī, governor, 55
 Band royal, 248
 Baraka Khān, of the Golden Horde, 265, 266, 277; his daughter 277
 Baraka Khān, es-Sa'īd, Bahri sultan, 277; inscriptions 276; tomb 276
 Bargawān, emir, 124, 125; street 151
 Bargūg, sieffee, 30, 62
 el-Baridī 84
 Barka 107, 128, 138, 197, 272, 304
 Barkiya troops 176
 Barkūk, es-Zāhir, Bahri sultan,

322, 326, 330-332; madresa 323, 332; tomb 323, 332; inscription 323

Bars-Bey, el-Ashraf, Burji sultan, 327, 336-341, 346; madresa and tomb 323; inscr. 323

Basil II, East Roman emperor, 120, 159

Bashir b. en-Nadr, kādī, 46

Bashmakiđar, supper-beater, 247

Basmür 104

el-Batūhi, see el-Māmūn

Bath, Night of the, 85

Baths, public, 12, 33, 133

Bāqīlīs 141

Baqtā, Ibn-, 314, 315

Bayeux casket 111

Bāyezid, 'Othmānīl sultan, 237, 332, 348, 352

Bedawis see Arabs

Bedr el-Gāzīlī, wadir, 150, 151, 152, 153, 161, 168, 201

Bēer 126, 273

Belusia 4, 112, 148, 287

Bekkār b. Kūcuba, kādī, 57, 58, 68, 69

Beklāsh, emir, 300

Bektimür (or Buktumür, Bektemur, Bekdemir) emir, 296, 302; inscr., 276

Beled, on Tigris, 73

Belfort (Shekīt Arūn) 218, 268

Belhib 10, 11

Bells 103, 197

Benjamin, patriarch, 2, 26

Berbers, 24, 31, 32, 95, 96, 97, 107, 134, 135, 137, 145, 146; troops, 118, 124, 125, 141; see Kitāma, Lewāta, Sanhāga

Berchem, M. van, v, xi, 59, 117, 153, 191, 201, 277, 324

Bernard, bishop of Palermo, 226

el-Bessīlī, emir, 138

Beshtāk, palace of emir, 276

Bethlehem 227

Beybars, ep-Zāhir, Bahri sultan, 184, 235, 246, 248-251, 257, 262-275; tomb 276; inscr. 242; lion 263

Beybars II, el-Muzāhir, Gāshnagīr, Bahri sultan, 288, 294, 295, 298, 300, 304-306; Khānakāh 276, 314, inscription 276

Beydara, emir, 276, 288

Beyn-el-Kapreyn, 109, 166, 168, 230, 257, 258, 264, 314, 332

Beyrūt 114, 206, 217, 220, 287, 335

Beysān 218, 262

Beysari, emir, 251, 291, 293, 302

Beyt-el-kādī 323

Beyt-el-māl (treasury) 156

Beyzar 147

Bibars see Beybars

Böckling-prayer see Khatla

el-Bilādhuri, historian, 15, 19, 45

Bilbek, emir, 242

Bilbeyse 2, 3, 20, 123, 177, 178, 184, 223

el-Bira 266, 270, 273, 332

Birket el-Jlabash ('Abyasimius' Lake) 140, 183

Bishr b. Sāfiwān, governor, 47

Black robes 103, 127

Black troops see Sūdānis

Boemond VI 217, 266, 268, 269; Boemond VII 281

Bona 112

Books, hills of destroyed, 149

Bridge of er-Rāqa 108, 141

Bugandage 135, 318, 320

Brooks, E. W., 8, 13

Bükâlamūn 112

Bülâk 112, 336

Bulgaria 310

Bulugīn, Yūsuf b. Zayrī, 107

el-Bundukdār (arbalist-steer) 263

Burg-ex-Zafar, Alexandria 323, 324

Burg Oghlu tribe 278

Burgi mamlūks 282, 305, 323-355; list of sultans 354

Burgundy, duke of, 236

Burhān-ed-din, Mongol gov., 332

Burlough, emir, 296

Bury, J. B., v, 7

Busiris 9, 20

Butcher, Mrs., 3, 240

Butler, A. J., 17

Buweyhids 106, 159

Byzantines see Romans, East

CAESAREA (Philippi) 159, 178, 267; archbishop of 228

Caesarea see Kayṣarīya
 Cairo (el-Kahira) 17; foundation 103; palaces 109, 110, 121, 133; manufactures 112, 122; luxury 122; described by Nāṣir-i-Khusrau 139, 140; Saladin's additions 195, 201; collection of coins 49, 51, 55, 56; see also Citadel, Mosque
 Calabria raided by Fatimids 97
 Calicut 339, 350
 Caliphate, 'Uthmānī, 265, 355
 Caliphs, government under, 18-58: in Egypt, 29, 37, 265; see also 'Abābāsids, Fatimids, Omayyads
 Calligraphy 187, 188
 Canals 20, 65, 157, 203, 233, 316: cutting the canal 85, 112, 141, 142
 Candles, wax, 219, 280
 Cannibalism 146, 169, 216
 Captain of the Guard 247
 Carmathians (Karmātīn) 76, 88, 89, 94, 101, 105; siege of Cairo, 106, 107, 113; 158
 Casanova, P., v, xi, 127, 193, 201, 276, 315
 Castle 281, 340
 Causeway 316
 Cerinon 338
 Centa 100
 Ceylon 281
 Chamberlains 155, 156, 176, 247
 Chancery 156
 Châtenoyroux 338
 Châtelain, Reginald of, 207, 208
 Chaul 352
 Chess 126, 147
 Chester, earl of, 222
 China 147, 281
 Chingiz Khān 271
 Christians of Egypt see Copts; Christian wife of caliph 'Arix 119; Christian alliances 180, 281
 Christodulus 143
 Chrysobullion, battle at, 70
 Churches 5, 12, 21, 26, 127, 144, 241, 301, 311; revenue of 170
 Cilicia (Lesser Armenia) 206, 217, 267, 270, 281, 287, 293, 299, 303, 348
 Circassian mamlūks 323-353
 Circassians 282, 295, 347
 Citadel of Cairo 105, 106, 201, 203, 206, 213, 230, 246, 274, 275-277, 282, 289, 291, 294, 314-316, 323, 330, 337, 344, 350; inner, 276, 323, 324
 Cock-fighting 261
 Coins 14, 49, 51, 55, etc., passim
 Colleges 204 see also Mosques
 Commander-in chief 128, 151, 156, 247; see also Marshal Commercial treaties 266
 Concerts 251
 Conrad, emperor, 174
 Constantine VIII 136; IX Monomachus 143
 Constantinople 259, 265, 266, 281, 300, 310, 337, 346, 355; mosque, 136, 143
 Convent of the Bones 103
 Copts 2, 5, 9, 11, 15, 19, 20, 26, 29, 32, 34, 37, 38, 39, 66, 70, 119, 120, 127, 128, 133, 143, 152, 166, 167-170, 205, 241, 282, 296, 300, 301, 310, 311, 320, 344, 349
 Corbet, E. K., 17
 Corn regulations 104, 143, 273, 312; import 143, 144
 Correspondence office 188, 246
 Corruption, official, 327, 329
 Corsairs 338
 Court, Fatimid, 141, 142, 155, 156, 180; mamlūk, 247; of justice, 104
 Corvée 20, 157
 Crac des Chevaliers (Hüṣn - el-Akrād) 217, 269
 Crete 36
 Crocodile Lake (Timsah) 20
 Crops 143
 Crosses 127
 Crusade, First, 163-165, 173; second 174; third 209-211; children's 218, 227; Hungarian, 218; of Frederick II 225-229; of the king of Navarre 230, 231; of Louis IX 231-239, 256
 Crystal 110, 111, 122, 147
 Cubit 26

Cup-bearer 247
 Cup, magic 193
 Curlew trumpet 100
 Currency 340
 Curse, public, 69
 Custom dues 303, 304, 339, 340,
     349
 Cyprus 217, 218, 223, 232, 269,
     286, 320, 336-339
 Cyrus 27
 Cyrus, patriarch, 7, 11, 13
 D = dirhār, half-a-guinea 6
 Dahabiyyas, state, 148
 Damascus 66, 67, 72, 73, 75, 76, 82,
     84, 85, 87, 88, 105, 106, 113, 114
     150, 158, 159, 160, 161, 174-177,
     183-185, 199, 205, 211, 213-215,
     229-231, 256, 258, 262, 264, 273,
     278, 280, 283, 287, 295-297, 329,
     330, 332, 333, 334, 335; misc.
     212, 242, 276, 277, 324
 Damietta (Dimyāt), 9, 10, 13, 41, 76, 112, 114, 151, 155; siege by Crusaders 192; siege by John of Ivrienne 219-224; by Louis IX
     232-239; 250, 304, 336
 Danis 9
 Darāzi, founder of Druzes, 132, 133
 Dar-el-'Adl 242
 Dar-el-Hadith 230
 Dar-el-'ilm or H̄ kma 130, 131
 Dar-el-Ma mūn 173, 204
 Dares 9
 Dārūm 159
 Davis, Rev. E. J., 233, 238
 Daw 271
 Dāwūd, k. of Nubia, 271
 Dāwūd b. Hubeyth, vice-gov., 53
 Dāwūd b. Yezid b. Hātim, gov., 52
 ed-Dāya, Ibn-, 71
 Dead Sea castles 197; see Karak and Shawbak
 Death, Black, 320
 Deblik 212, 122, 148
 Dehlek 339
 Derbeslik 267
 Dereksa 233
 Derenbourg, H., 171, 172, 175
 Deylemis 141
 Dhukā er-Kūni (Ducas), gov., 79
 Dbū'l-Fikar sword 148
 Dhū'l-Kadr 310, 321, 335, 346, 347,
     352, 353
 Dihya b. Mustab, rebel, 33, 34
 Dikes 157, 203
 Dimity (Dimyāt) 112
 Dir nū 144
 Diplomas 247, 291, 294
 Diplomatic 27, 297
 Dirghām 175-178
 Diseases, isolation of contagious, 273
 Dispatches 188, 246
 Div 352
 Diwan muṣṭafī 128
 Dīrā-el-dīr 111, 312
 Dīrā-Bekr 352
 ed-Dizberi 159, 160
 Djem, Prince or G'ema
 Docks 112, 120, 123
 Dome of the Air, 31, 63
 Dome of the Rock (Kulibat-es-Şâkhe), Jerusalem, 190, 270, 324
 Domitianus, praeses of Arcadia, 4, 9, 10
 Dongola, siege, 21, 271
 Doorkeeper, grand, 250
 Dozy, R. P., 36
 Drum, magic, 160
 Drummer 248, lords of, 248
 Druzes 133, 134, 297, 308
 Dukkā 163
 Duitbea 308
 Dureyc, Ibn-, 149
 EARTHQUAKES 81, 88, 216, 301, 302
 Edessa 163, 174, 229; architects 152
 Edward Plantagenet 269, 270
 Election of sultan 290
 Elephants in Egypt 41, 122, 271
 Embaba 355
 Embassies 109, 180, 265, 280, 288,
     297, 299, 300, 337, 338, 354
 Emeralds 45, 111, 147, 148; mines
     304
 Emir-Akhōr 247
 Emir-'Alam 246, 248
 Emir-Bābdār 250
 Emir-el-Guyūsh 151

Gâni-bek el-Malak 338; mosque 323
 Gardens of Cairo 195, see Küfür el-Gâregarâ, vezir, 136, 148 el-Gârâb, Ibn-, calligrapher, 188
 Gârâb family 159
 Gâshnezir (taster) 247, 288
 Gates of Cairo 117, 152, see Bâb Gâwhar er-Rûmî, founder of Cairo, 99-108 111, 122
 Casa (Ghazza) 161, 175, 176, 231, 257, 261, 262; inscr. 277, 324
 Gazelle Valley 179
 Gâbela, inscriptions, 277
 Gâkem, emir, 334
 Gâlâris 332
 Gâm sultan (Prince Djem) 347
 Gâmâl-ed-dîn el-Halabi, historian, 66 122, 165 el-Gâmâli see Bedr
 Gâned 197
 Genoa taken by Fâtimids 97
 Genoese 320, 338
 George the Cyprian 3
 Georgian troops 279
 Gârbâsh, admiral, 336
 Germans at 'Aleka 209, 217; at Damietta 222, 224 el-Gâsûr 278
 Gâybûn river 267, 347
 Gâysh b. Khumâraweyh, Tâlîwî, 75
 Gezirat-es-Şîndî's (Rôda) 26
 Ghânim, tomb of, 323
 Ghâshiya 249
 Ghawth b. Suleymân, kâdî, 40, 50, 51, 52
 Ghâzân, İlkhân, 295-299 el-Ghûrî, el-Ashraf Kansûh, Burjî sultan 349-354; mosques and other buildings 323; inscr. 324
 Ghûriya 350
 Gâddâ (Jelda) 339, 340, 350
 Girafe 41, 271, 273
 Gîrgis, Gârâyî, George, son of Menas, see Muâkawât Girls, massacre of, 136
 el Gâza 30, 43, 102, 107, 129, 141, 170, 304; camp 86; fleet at 82; like 203; bridge 323; pyramids 38
 Gâzya (poll-tax) 5, 7, 19, 25, see Taxes
 Glass 112, 141, 147, 314; glass-stamps and weights 14, 27, 44, 47-53, 187, 124, see list of illustrations
 Golden Hornet, Khâns of, 265, 266, 273, 277, 281, 282, 299, 308, 332
 Golden House 26
 Gothic gateway 302
 Governor, provincial, 18-58
 Granaries 143, 312
 Grave-stones 14, 59
 Greek slaves 119; sultans 325; troops 155, 121, 341
 Guards 247
 Guard, body-, 61, 71, 75, 243 ff.
 Guard, Young, 156, 167, 171
 Gâbeyî 161, 165
 Gâbeyî, Ibn- 204
 Gâuff the Ikhshidî, 82
 Gûgvât, king of, 352
 Gûkandâr (polo-master) 247, 249, 302
 Gârdik 185
 Guy of Lusignan 208, 209 el-Gâyîshî mosque 117
 el-Gâyîshîya troops 163
 Hâpin b. Abâîn, marshall, 52
 Hâdranawî 138
 el-Hâfi, Fâtimid caliph, 140, 166-171
 Hâfe b. el-Wâlid, marshall, 47, 48; governor 48, 49
 Hâfiids of Tunis 308
 Hâggî, eç-Sâlibî and el-Mançûr, Bahri sultan, 254, 330
 Hâifa 210, 218
 Hair, women's, sent in supplication, 173, 184
 Hâithon 267
 el-Hâkam of Cordova 15
 el-Hâkim, 'Abbâsid caliph of Egypt, 265, 287 el-Hâkim, Fâtimid caliph, 119, 123-134, 150, 187, 188; mosque 117, 123, 129, 189, 196, 276, 302; inscriptions 117, 276

Habashah 247
 Haïqa (bodyguard) 243ff.; see guard
 Hall of Columns 315
 Hall of Science 130, 131
 Hamâh 199, 213, 215, 229, 262,
     270, 272, 278, 279, 280, 306;
     Horns of 200; inscr. 277, 324
 Hammâniâ 83-85, 87, 105, 106, 159
 Hammer, J. von 117
 el-Hamrâ al-Kušwâ 30
 Hamra, shield of, 148
 Hamra of Sûsan 232
 Hanafi school 39
 Hançala b. Ḫafwân, governor, 47, 48
 Haram of Jerusalem and Alqâb mosque 227; inscriptions, 77,
     190, 277, 324
 Harbaweyh, Ibn-, kâdi, 77, 79
 Harene 178
 el-Hârith b. Meskin, kâdi, 57 el-Hârith b. Zur'a, marshal, 55
 Harrân 67, 160
 Marthama b. A'yan, gov., 53
 Marthama b. en-Nâqr, gov., 57
 Hârûn b. Khumâraweyh, Tâlûnid,
     75, 77
 Hârûn ar-Rashid, 'Abbâsid caliph,
     34, 35, 147
 Hârûn ez-Zuhri, kâdi, 56, 57
 Hasan el-Akkram 132
 Hasan Burzûq, 307
 el-Hasan, Fâtimid pretender, 162
 Hasan en-Nâqr, Bahri sultan, 318; mosque and tomb 276, 330;
     inscr. 277, 323
 Hasan b. Ahmad, Karmatî, 105, 113
 Hasan b. el-Hâfiq 168
 Hasan, brother of Ikhshîd, 87
 el-Hasan b. et-Takhtah, gov., 54 el-Hasan b. Yezid, marshal, 47, 52 el-Hasaneyn, mosque, 212
 Hâshim b. 'Abdalâh, marshal, 51, 54
 Hashish 273
 Hassân b. 'Atâhiya, governor and
     vice-governor 49
 Hassân b. Daghîl, rebel, 159, 160
 Hâtim, governor, 31
 Hâtim b. Marthama, gov., 54, 57
 Hawâdîg-Khânâh 248

Hawdag 166
 Hawâl (eastern delta) 24, 27, 28, 31, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 43, 75, 82
 Hawking 171, 250, 316 el-Hawthara b. Suheyl, gov., 49
 Hayyân b. Shureyb, treasurer, 47
 Heads, Museum of, 171
 Hebron 267, 277
 Heliopolis ('Ayn-Shems) 4, 5, 306,
     113, 145
 Henry of Champagne 209, 216, 217
 Henry II of Cyprus, 286
 Henry VI, emperor, 217
 Heraclius 7, 13
 Hermitage Collection of Coins 55
 Herz Bey v, xi, 332
 Illeoreles 3
 el-Higâz 105, 135, 141, 279 el-Higâziya, princess Tatar, modresa, 276
 Hilâl, Arab tribe, 138
 Hilâl b. Bîr, governor, 79
 Hilâl taxes 43
 Ummâ (Emesa) 159, 199, 205, 213,
     215, 229, 262, 272, 279, 295,
     296; inscription on tomb of Khâlid 242
 Hindûstân 310
 Ujan-el-Akrâa (Crac des Chevaliers)
     217, 269
 Historians under Fâtimids 187
 Hit 74
 Hitîn 203, 218
 Holy Land see Palestine
 Honey 126
 Hor, inscription at Mt., 277
 Horse breeding 316; racing 43, 250, 316
 el-Hoseyn, eunuch of, 148; marty-dom 92, 115
 el-Hoseyn, admiral, 352
 el-Hoseyn b. Gâwbar 128 el-Hoseyn b. G'emîl, governor, 54 el-Hoseyn b. 'Obeydaâjîh, Ikhâbidid, 89, 101, 105
 Hoseyn, mosque of emir, 276
 Hospital, Knights of the, 205, 219, 225, 269, 270, 278, 281, 286, 287,
     see Rhodes Hospitals 283-4

Houses 139
 Housing 247
 Howorth, Sir H. H., 242, 296, 298
 Hubeyra b. Ilâkîm b. Ilâleyg, marshal, 55
 Huçeyra, Ibn-, kâdî, 47
 Hugh of Caesarea 180, 181, 182
 Hugh III of Cyprus 269
 Hugh of Tiberias 205
 Hüktü 261, 262
 Hulaguids 264, see Ilkhans
 Hulwân 26
 Humeyd, governor, 32
 Humphrey of Toron 206
 el-Jurj b. Yûsuf, governor 48
 Isatîn, Baldwin and Italian of, 203; John of 268
 Ibn- see under second word
 İbrâhim of Karamân 346
 İbrâhim b. el-Bekkâ, kâdî, 54
 İbrâhim b. el-Gârrâh, kâdî, 55, 56
 İbrâhim b. İshâk, kâdî, 55
 İbrâhim b. Khumârawejh 78
 İbrâhim b. el-Nu'ayyâl 335
 İbrâhim b. Sâ'îd, governor, 51, 52
 İbrîm (Pîris) 197
 'Id (Barâm) 109
 'Id-el-Magribas 86
 İdefisids 95
 İdeguz 151
 el-Ikhshid, Mohammad b. Tughî, governor, 81-86
 İkhshidids, 86-89, 105, 107, 113
 İkrima b. 'Abdallâh, marshal, 49, 50; vice-gov. 50
 İl-Gâzi, Ortaköy, 164
 Ilkhans of Persia 264, 265, 266, 270, 271, 275, 288, 295-299, 307
 Illumination 86
 İmârî, Twelth, 167
 İmâmate 93 ff., 108
 İmâmians 167
 Import duties 304, see Trade
 'Imrân b. 'Abd-er-Rahmân, marshal and kâdî, 46
 İnal, el-Ashraf, Birgi sultan, 338, 341, 346; medresa 323; inscriptions 324; solar quadrant 323

İnâl el-Vâsifi, madresa, 323
 Incendiarism 312
 India, 281, 310
 Indian slave 160
 Indian trade 303, 339, 340, 350, 352
 Industries 112, 122
 Inscriptions 14, 59, 117, 212, 242, 276, see headings of chapters
 Intoxicating liquors 126, 273, see Beer, Wine
 Investments 265, 291, 294
 Iridescent manufactures 112
 Irrigation 18, 20, 157
 'Isâ b. Ahî-'Atâ, treasurer, 49
 'Isâ b. Mansûr, governor, 56, 57
 'Isâ b. Mohammad, gov., 78, 79
 'Isâ b. el-Munkâbir, kâdî, 40, 56
 'Isâ b. Nestâris, vezir, 120, 121, 128
 'Isâ b. Yezîl, governor, 56
 Isabella of Jerusalem 217, 218
 Isfâhsâlar 156
 Isfendiyâr, İlân-, 56
 İshâk b. el-Furâî, kâdî, 53
 İshâk b. Kordâgîk 72, 73, 74
 İshâk b. Suleymân, governor, 53
 İshâk b. Yâbyâ (Khüt), gov., 57
 İsmâ'il b. 'Isâ, merchant, 52; gov. 53
 İsmâ'il b. Sâ'îd, governor, 53
 İsmâ'il b. Sumeyî, kâdî, 51
 İsmâ'il see es-Sâlih
 İsmâ'ilans see Assassins
 İlîsh, sieffee, 30, 57
 'Iyâd b. 'Abdallâh, kâdî, 47
 'Iyâd b. Hayram, marshal, 48
 J: for Arabic words beginning with J see G'
 Jacobite church 2, see Copta
 Jacob's Ford 205
 Jaffa (Yâfa) 106, 107, 164, 165, 210, 211, 217, 218, 220, 267, 268
 Jahângîr 255
 Jerusalem 128, 136, 143, 161, 163, 164, 192, 198, 208, 210, 211, 217-219, 222, 224-228, 259, 266, 267, 287, 300, 306, 344, see Haram, Crusades, Baldwin, Amâlîc, etc.; inscr., 377, 324

Jews 11, 70, 126, 137, 300, 301, 344, 349
 John of Brienne 218, 222, 225
 John II of Cyprus 338
 John of Nârûz 3
 John the Monk 152
 John of Nîkiu 3, 4, 6, 8, 11, 12, 13
 John, St., church at Alexandria, 8 ; monastery at Cairo 140
 Joinville 226, 232 ff., 239, 250

 Kâ'ba 145 ; covering for 112, 113
 Kâbus (Gâbes) 107
 Kâfi, ch. es., 18, 33, 39, 40, 45 ff., 104, 119, 156, 157
 Kâfîk, four, 274
 Kâfor Alî-i-Misk 84, 87-90, 101 ;
     garden of 85, 103, 109, 125 ;
     inscription 77
 el-Kâfi Alî, Ibn-, kâfi, 152 el-Kâfir, 'Abbâsid caliph b., 52 el-Kâfir 263
 el-Kâfir (Mars) 103
 el-Kâfura see Cairo
 el-Kâsim, Fât mid caliph, 80, 97,
     98, 148
 Kait-Bey, el-Ashraf, Burghî sultan, 336, 342-349 ; medresses and other buildings 323, 344 ; in sculptures 323, 324
 Kal'at-e-Kebsh 237
 Kal'at-el-Kum 287
 Kaâdûn (Kâbûlîn), el-Mansûr, Bahri sultan 277-284 ; mosque and hospital 276, 302 ; inscriptions 276, 277, 323 ; family of 244, 254, 276-322
 el-Kâlikashandi, historian, 154, 184, 303
 Kalmûn 148
 Kalyûb 6 ; rosaries at 166
 Kamhiya college 204
 el-Kâmil, Ayyûbid, 201, 215, 221-230, 240, 241, 257 ; medresa 212, 230 el-Kâmil el-Husayn, marshal, 54
 el-Kâmil see Sha'bân
 Kâmilîya college 230
 Kânişûb 323, 349 ; see Ghûrî
 Kântemir, decree, 323

 Karabaçek, J., 6
 Karak 197, 207, 257, 260, 261, 272,
     277, 279, 305, 330 ; inscr. 242,
     276, 277
 Karâkîsh, wazîr, 193, 203, 251
 Karamân 271, 335, 346, 347
 Karâsunkur, emir, 259
 Karî-i Isuf 332
 Karkar 347
 Karkisiyî 68, 272
 Karmatis see Carmathians
 Kasim-emir-el-mâ min 263
 Kasim el-Bekr, kâfi, 54
 el-Kâsim b. 'Ubaydallâh, treas., 29, 43 el-Kâfir, painter, 111
 el-Kast 23
 Kast-el-Abâk 315
 Kast-esh-Shemâ' 17, see Babylon el-Kâfî, Ibn Tâjî's capital, 63,
     74, 76, 105
 Katr-en-Nerî 74
 Kâwshîn, emir, 312, 318 ; mosque
     276, 314 ; sâlar quadrant 323
 Kay, II C., xi, 117
 Kayrawân 96, 97, 98, 100, 102, 107,
     110, 138
 Kayşarîya (Caesarea) 270, 271, 335
 Kay-Khusru 266
 Kay-Kubâd 229
 Kebsh, castle of, 237
 Keening women 43
 Kelbîs of Sicily 138
 Kemenga 249
 Kennâ, Abu-Negâh b., 166
 Kenz, Arab tribe, 29, 308
 Kenz-ed-dawla 308
 Kerafa 131, 204 ; mosque 111, 123
 Kesta Stygiotes 70
 Ketbughâ, el-'Adil, Bahri sultan,
     248, 262, 288-290, 292 ; inscr.
     277
 Keys, Arab tribe, 28, 33, 35
 Keys b. Sa'd 25, 45
 Keysûr 147
 Khalangî javelins 148
 el-Khalangî, Muhammad, rebel, 78, 79
 Khaldîrân 352, 353
 Khaldûn, Ibn-, 6

Khālid, tomb of, at Mims, 242
 Khālid b. Ibrīb, vice-governor, 50
 Khālid b. Yezdī, marshal, 52
 Khalīf see Caiphs
 Khalīq (canal of Cairo) 20, 112
 Khalīl, el-Ashraf 284-288; tomb 276; inscr. 277
 Khalīl, Umm- 255
 el-Khalīl, Ibn-, poet, 188
 Khalīkūn, Ibn-, 70, 123, 175, 220, 240
 Khān-el-Khalīl 245
 Khān see Golden Horde, Ikhāns
 Khānshāh 314
 el-Khandaq 115
 Kharāq (land tax) 6, see taxes
 Kharābiā 34
 Khāringa b. Hudhayfa, marshal, 45
 Khāringa 31, 32
 Khartibet 347
 Khāṣṭ lances 148
 Kbedival library 44
 Kheyf bek, emir, 342, 354, 355; mosque 323
 Kheyf b. Nō'eym, kādi and vice-governor, 48, 49, 50
 Khidr, el-Ā'es'ud, Ayyubid, 277 el-Khiyār b. Khālid, kādi, 48
 Khubāsa, Fūtimid general, 80
 Khumāraweyh, son of Ibn-Tūlūn, 71-75
 Khūshkadam ez-Zābit, Burjī sultan, 325, 328, 329, 338, 341; inscriptions 324
 Khūt, Ishaq b. Valyā, 57
 Khutba (bidding prayer) 69, 103, 104, 109, 193
 Khuzeymā, Abū-, kādi, 40, 50, 51
 Khwārimāz 273
 Khwānzimāz 231
 Kīmīs, mosque of emir, 323
 Külis, Ibn-, wezīr, 101, 114, 120, 121, 186, 187
 Kināna, Arab tribe, 232, 233 el-Kindī 20, 28, 187
 Kingsford, C. L., 287
 Kipchak 263, 265, 278, 310
 Kipchak, emir, 298
 Kirsh, Ibn-, 168
 Kirwāsh el-'Okeyl 159
 Kiryawn 10
 Kitāba Berbers 95, 124, 125, 128, 133, 141, 145
 Kuchen 166, 243, 327, 335
 Knighting of Muslims by Christians 200, 201, 213
 Korāns, illuminated, 149, 273, 314
 Kubbat-el-Hawa (Dome of the Air) 31, 63 Kubbat-en-Sakhra see Dome of the Rock el-Ku'lā 187
 Kufic inscriptions 189, see headings of chapters
 Kufit 41
 Kuğuk, mosque of, 276
 Kulthūm, Sittā, 115
 Kulzūm 30, 41, 42, 106
 Kumiz 273
 Kundūgik, Ibn-, governor of Mēris, 72, 73, 74
 Kurdistan 206
 Kurds 171, 191, 207, 320
 Kurta, Arab tribe, 128, 132
 Kurra b. Sharik, governor, 26, 47
 Kurši zarīn 162
 Kūs 41, 157, 183, 271, 300
 Kuseyr 41, 304
 Kutlūburghā, mosque, 276
 Kutlughshāh 298
 Kuṭāz, el-Muṣaffar, Bahri sultan, 261, 262, 272, 273
 el-Laq'āt, battles of, 83, 87
 Lāgīn, el-Mansūr, Bahri sultan, 253, 285, 289-294; cistern 276; inscr. 277
 Laki' el-Hadrami, kādi, 55
 Lahi'a, Ibn-, kādi, 40, 51
 Lakhm, Arab tribe, 36, 38, 176
 Lambs, enamelled, 314; market of, 141
 Land assessment 114; grants of 244, 250; land tax 114, 142, 143, 151, 193, 344, see Taxes
 Lane, E. W., 275, 284
 Lane Poole, S., Art of the Saracens in Egypt, 111, 112, 242, 244, 276, 278, 284; Catalogue of Arabic Glass Weights 117, 190; Catalogue of Oriental Coins 242, 255, 276;

Life of Saladin, 111, 174, 176, 191, 197, 199, 214

Lareida 335

Larissa 337

Latakia (al-Ladhiyya) 251; inscr.
277

Lavora, II., 89

Law figure 163

Lebba 68

Lewata Berbers 146, 151

Leslat-el-Ghūtās 85

el-Leyth b. el-Kāfi, governor 53

Lituray, Alexandria, 12, Fatimid
130, 131, 149, 193; Mamluk 204

Labyr 24

Limasol (Leressün) 269, 336, 337

Lion, Isma'īl, 75; of Beybars 203

Literature 60, 91, 180-188, 230,
230, 320, 322

Louis I 112

Lord of the Islands 248

Lord of the Sea 247

Lorenço, son of Almeida, 352

Louis VII of France, 174; Louis
IX 231, 239, 256; Louis XII 195

Lu lu 68

Lu lu of el-Mosil 260

Lu lu, Ibn-, 159

Luxury 74, 89, 250-252, 302, 313, 318

MĀDARĀNī treasurers 77, 79-82

Māgūr 66

Magnusa (Famagusta) 336

Mahalla, canal of, 238

Mahdi, the, 94, 167

el-Mahdi, 'Abbāsid caliph, 53 el-Mahdi, 'Obeydallāh, 1st Fatimid caliph, 95-97

el-Mahdiya 98, 137, 138

Mahūd b. Suleym, treasurer, 53

el-Mahrūsa 103

el-Makrizi 17, 21, 27, 48, 65, 90,
111, 152, 167, 173, 204, 250,
251, 253, 255, 259, 265, 279, 281,
296, 340

Maks, dock, 112, 120; mosque 129

Malatīya 330

Mālik b. Delhem, governor, 54

Mālik b. el-Hārith 45

Mālik b. Keytar, governor, 57

Mālik b. Sharāt il-Kāfi, 40

Mālik school 31, 130

Ma'abiyā 120

el-Māmāy palace of emir, 323

Mamiks (white slaves) 60, 71, 235, 237, 239, 242-257

el-Māmūr, Abū'l-Aswād caliph, 35, 36, 37; in Egypt 37, 38; 56, 147

el-Māmūn el-Latābi, wezir, 131, 102, 106, 173

Manasseh, secretary, 120

el-Manṣakur b. Kurkub 5

Manṣūr 304

Manfred 206

Mangāk, mosque of emir, 276

Mangīzegin 159

Mangutumur Mongol general, 270, 280

Mangūmār wezir, 203, 204

Mangūr b. Yezid, governor, 51

el-Mansūr 'Abd al-Aswād caliph, 32

el-Mansūr, Fūtimid caliph, 95

el-Mansūr b. el-'Aqīz 215

el-Mansūr see 'Abd-el-Azīz, 'Ali, Ilaggi, Kalā'ān, Lāqīn, 'Oth-mān

el-Mansūra 223, 232-237, 243

el-Mansūriya 98, 103, 107

Mantel the Armenian 20

Manufac'tures 112, 122, 147

Manuscripts 149

Manzara (belvedere) 170

Map of the world 111, 145

Marakīya 281

Mar'ash 287

Marche, Count of 222

Marco Polo 263, 269

Marq 'Adhrū 87

Marq Dābilik 353

Marq 'Oyün (Mergion) 205

Marq-es-Saffar 298

Margaret of Tyre 281

el-Mārisānī, mosque, 276, 314

Māridin 332

Mārisān Kañūn 283-284, 323

Markab (Margat) 217, 269, 270,
278, 281; inscr. 276

Marriage dot 74

Marshal or commander-in-chief 18, 45-53
 Marwān I and II in Egypt 29, 30
 Marwān b. Marwān, marshal, 49
 Marwān, Ibn-, see 'Abd-el-'Aziz,
     'Abd-el-Melik, Mo'awiya
 Mary the Copt 6
 Mary of Jerusalem 213
 Mas Latrī, Comte de, 338, 339
 Masūl, Ibn-, wezir, 171
 Maslama b. Nukballad, gov., 26, 46
 Maslama b. Yābū, governor, 52
 el-Maqṣīya 66, 270
 Masters of the Halliards, of the Horse, of the Household, of the Wardrobe, 247
 Masts, battle of the, 23
 el-Mātūdī visits Egypt 83, 86
 Mausoleum, fātimid, 110
 el-Medīna 15, 20, 23, 84, 105, 114, 148, 265, 272, 308, 339
 el-Medīna (Cairo) 109
 Medresa or collegiate mosque 204,
     see also Mosques
 el-Miqnā 341
 Mehren, Prof., 226
 Mekka 69, 84, 88, 105, 114, 123,
     138, 148, 159, 265, 272, 308, 320,
     337-340, 344, 350; pilgrimage
     302, 312, 318; forbidden 32
 Melekite church 2, 119, 266
 Melik, title of wezir, 169
 Melik Shāh, Seljuk sultan, 161, 163
 Melona, 'Abdallāhī, 37
 Merdūd, Abū-Sahl b. ibn-, gov., 33, 51
 Memphis 3
 Men of the Pen and of the Sword 155
 Menagerie 63, 75
 Menas 10, 15; see Muṣawwīs
 Mercurius, 56, ch., 119
 Mesopotamia 190, 199, 200, 200,
     207, 213-215, 229, 262, 265, 266, 320, 331
 el-Mes'ūd Yūsuf 257
 el-Mes'ūd see Khīḍat
 Metrons 81
 Meydān (horse-course) 63, 74
 Meymūn b. es-Sarī, marshal, 55
 Michael IV, emperor, 136, 160
 Michael VIII Palaeologus 266
 el-Mihmendīs, mosque, 276
 Military tyranny 218
 Müne, J. G., 6, 18
 Mint 18, see Coins
 Mu'lāsh, emir, 326, 330-333
 Munya 181
 Mūneles 96, 97
 Mūrādūd 160
 Miskā, Sittā, mosque, 276
 Miskawayh, Ibn-, 42
 Missionaries, Maxima, 94-96, 99
 Mīṣr 3; siege by Arabs 4-9; crin
     49, see also Fustāt
 el-Mutallaka church 17, 301
 Mo'awiya, first Omayyad caliph, 54
 Mo'awiya b. Hudeyq, marshal, 45
 Mo'awiya b. Marwān, treas., 50
 Mo'awiya b. Ṣurād, marshal, 53, 54
 Mohammad the Prophet, sword of,
     148
 Mohammad II of Turkey 346, 347
 Mohammad 'Ali 201
 Mohammad el-Kuwayri 41
 Mohammad b. 'Abd-el-Melik, gov., 47
 Mohammad b. 'Abd-el-Rahmān b.
     Hudeyq, vice-gov., 51; gov., 51
 Mohammad b. Abi-Bekr, gov., 45
 Mohammad b. Abi-Leyth, kādi, 57
 Mohammad b. el-Akh'āth, gov., 50
 Mohammad b. 'Aṣadīma, marshal,
     54, 45
 Mohammad b. G'ald, marshal, 54
 Mohammad b. Iṣā, marshal, 56
 Mohammad b. Kabis, marshal, 55
 Mohammad b. Mārūk, kādi, 53
 Mohammad b. Mo'awiya, marshal and vice-gov., 50
 Mohammad b. Niṣār, Fātimid pre-tender, 162
 Mohammad b. 'Oḳba, marshal, 56
 Mohammad b. 'Umeyr, marshal, 56
 Mohammad b. es-Sarī, governor, 55
 Mohammad b. Suleymān, general,
     76
 Mohammad b. Taghlak, sultana of Dehli, 310
 Mohammad b. Tāhir, marshal, 79

Mohammad b. Ta'ār, Burqī sultan, 336
 Mohammad b. Tekī, governor, 79
 Mohammad b. Tūbū, marshal, 54
 Mohammad b. Taghg el-Ikhshid, 79, see Ikhshid
 Mohammad b. Ziyād, treasurer, 54
 Muhammad b. Zuheyr, gov., 52
el-Moharraqiya 98
 Mūhamed 104, 156, 312
el-Mo'taz, Fātimid caliph 98-118, 148; daughters of 147 el-Mo'taz of Mahdiya 137, 138
el-Mo'taz see Aybek Mo'taz ed-dawla, Mīrdūsch, 160
el-Mo'taziya 103, 139, 162
 Monasteries 26, 107, 140, 170, 187, 311
 Mongols 259, 261, 262, 264-266, 269-271, 279-282, 293-299, 307, 330
 Monks Coptic, 26, see Monasteries
 Monogamy 100
 Monophysite church 2, see Copts
 Monopolies 43, see Trade
 Montfort, Simon of, 231
 Montréal (Shawlik), 197, 257, 272
el-Mūsīl 123, 199, 206, 214
 Mosques of Cairo with dates of foundation (medresas or collegiate mosques marked *; tomb mosques †) —
 * Abd-el-Bāsīt (1420) 323
 * Abd-el-Ghāni (1418) 323
 † Abd-er Rahmān 242
 * Abū Bekr b. Mu'ādh (1480) 323
 * Albughā (1334) 276
el-Alkraar (1125) 117, 166, 169
Aksunkur (1347) 276
Alīnīs (1330) 276
Al-mellik (1319) 276
 † Anas (1382) 323
 * Arghūn (1348) 276
el-Ashraf Sha'bān (1368) 276
Aslam (1346) 276
 * Aytmiss (1383) 323
el-Azhar (970-972) 117, 276; inscr. 117, 242, 324
 * Barkūk (1386) 323, † (1401-11) 323
 * Bark-Bey (1424) 323, † (1432) 323

Mosques of Cairo—continued.
 * Beybars et-Zihir (1262) 242, 1(1267-69) 242
 Beybars Ushnayir, khānakah (1310) 276
 Beydar 276
 Ellek (1475)
Ezbek el-Yusufi (1396) 323 el-Fadawiya (1481) 323 el-Fakāhī (1148) 117
 * † Farmī (1401-11) 323
 † el-Fārisī (1225) 212
 * Firuz (1427) 323
 † el-Gīzī el-Vesūfī (1373) 276
Gākmal (1449) 323
Gāsi Hek (1427, † 1465) 323
 † Gīzī al-ed-dīn (1408) 323
 † Hāmid (1478) 323
 † el-Ghāūl (1503, † 1504) 323 el-Gīyashī (1283) 117
el-Hālikī (990-1003) 117, 276; inscr. 117, 276 * † Ihsān, sultan (1356-62) 276
el-Hasaneyn (old, 1235), 212
 * † el-Higūzīya (1360) 276
Hoseyn (1319) 276
Ibn-Kuzzik (1160) 117, 276; inscr. 276
Ibn-Tūlūn (877) 59, 63, 65, 276; inscr. 117 150
 * † Ināl el-Vesūfī (1392) 323
 * † Ināl (1451-56) 323
 † Ismā'il (1216) 212
 * † Kālī-Bey (1474, 1475) 323, 344
 † Kālī-ūn (1284 — 1303) 276, 283-284; inscr. 277
 * † Kāmil (1224) 212
Kāni-Bey (1441) 323
Kāni-Bek emir Akhōr (1503) 323
Kāni-Bek Karū (1506) 323
 * Kānim (1466) 323
 † Kānpūh (1499) 323
Kawāfi (1329) 276
 † Kħallī (1258) 276
Kheyri-Bek (1502) 323
Kīmūs (1481) 323
Kugūk (1346) 276
Kutlubughā (1348) 276
Mangak (1350) 276

Mosques of Cairo—continued,
 †el-Māridūnī (1338) 276
 el-Mihmendūrī (1325) 276
 Miskī, Sittā (1339) 276
 el-Murayyad (1420) 323
 *Mukbil (1395) 323
 *en-Nasir Muhammad (1299; 1318) 276, 302, 314; inscr. 276
 Nefīs, Sittā, 115, 195, 261; inscr. 117
 Ordubegīn Khālīn (1324) 276
 †Reşmeli (1504) 323
 *eq-Sāḥīh Ayyubī (1243) 212, †(1250) 242
 Ṣāghitnīsh (1327) 276
 *Songar el-Gāwālī and Sa'īd (1323) 276, 314
 †Sheger-ed-durr (1257?) 242
 †esh-Shūfī (1211) 212
 Shīvkhī (1350-55) 276, 314
 *Sūlān (1402) 323
 †Tashīmūr (1334) 276
 *Taghīrī-Berīt (1440) 323
 *Taybarsī (1309) 276
 Timrīz (1472) 323
 †Tinkiz (1363) 276
 †Tulbiyyā (1364) 276
 †Tūmān Bey el-'Adīl (1501) 323
 †Zeyn-ed-dīn Yūsuf (1298) 276
 Mosque of Constantinople 266
 Mosque of Pity 21
 el-Mo'tasim, Fāṭimūl pretender 193 el-Mo'tasim, fiefsee and gov., 37, 56 el-Mo'tamid, 'Abbāsid caliph, 69, 73, 74
 Mo'adh b. 'Arīz, marshal, 56 el-Mu'ayyad, Burqī sultan, 327, 328, 334-336, 346; mosque 323; inscriptions 323, 324 el-Mu'ayyad see Ahmad
 el-Mu'azzam b. el-Ādī, Ayyubid, 215, 221, 225, 226
 Mudebīr, Ibn-, treasurer, 43, 57, 58, 61, 66, 67, 71 el-Mu'addīl b. Fudāla, Kādī, 40, 52, 53 el-Mughīra b. 'Obeydallāh, gov., 49 el-Mughīth 'Omar 257, 260, 261, 272 el-Mulāqīr b. 'Othmān, marshal, 56
 Mu'in-ed-dīn 270
 Muir, Sir W., 317
 el-Mu'izz see el-Mo'izz el-Mukattam hills 31, 75, 131, 134, 195 el-Mukawīkī, George, son of Menas, 3, 6, 7-9 Mukhārik, Ibn-el-, marshal, 55
 el-Mukhtārī, palace, 85
 Mukīs, Abū-l-, marshal, 53
 Mukīs, Ibn, 149
 Mumīn 86
 Münnī, general, 81
 el-Muntakib, fiefsee, 30, 57
 el-Muntaqār, the expected Imām, 167
 Murā, Arab tribe, 279
 Mu'ād el-Hanafī, governor, 57
 Mu'ād b. 'Isā, governor, 31, 34, 35, 52, 53
 Mu'ād b. Ka'bī, governor, 50
 Mu'ād b. Mu'sāb, governor, 34, 52
 Mu'ād b. 'Olāyy, gov., 32, 33, 51
 Mu'ād b. Zārik, marshal, 51
 Mu'ād see el-Ashraf el-Muselīnī 187
 Muslim, Abū-G'a'far, 102
 Muslim b. Beckīr, marshal, 53 el-Mustadī, 'Abbāsid caliph, 190 el-Musta'in, 'Abbāsid caliph of Egypt, 335 el-Musta'in, Fāṭimīd caliph, 161 el-Mustansīr, 'Abbāsid caliph of Egypt, 265 el-Mustansīr, Fāṭimīd caliph, 136, 154, 160 el-Mustansīr, 'Abbāsid caliph, 255 el-Mustekīl 305
 el-Mutanebbī 38
 el-Mutawakkīl, 'Abbāsid caliph, 41 el-Mutawakkīl, last caliph of Egypt, 355 el-Mutī', 'Abbāsid caliph, 106 el-Mutiākīl, 'Abbāsid caliph, 84 el-Mu'talib el-Khuza'i, governor, 55 el-Mu'waffak, 30, 63, 66-69, 72-74 el-Mugāfiq b. Keydar, marshal and governor, 56

el-Muqaffar see Ahmad, Beybars II, Kutuz
 Mu'âlim b. Khâkân, governor, 58
 Muâzîzîl 187
 Nahyâ, monastery of, 170
 Nâib-es-Saltâna 247, 261, 283
 Naphtha tubes 296
 en-Nâsir, 'Alâ'îsîd caliph, 190 en-Nâsir, caliph of Cordova, 112 en-Nâsir of Damascus 230 n., 256, 258-261, 268
 en-Nâsir Muhammad b. 'Abd al-
     Kâlîm 248, 284, 288, 289, 292, 294-317,
     342, 344; medrâsa and mosque
     276, 302, 314; inscriptions 276
 en-Nâsir Yûsuf 257
 en-Nâsir see Farag, Hasan
 Nâsir-e-iâwâlî b. Hamîdûn 145,
     146, 148, 149, 150, 160
 Nâsîr-i Khushrau 121, 139, 162
 Nâsîrlîyâ (âshârîlîyâ) College 204
 Nasîr (Keydar), governor, 56
 Nasîr b. 'Abbâs 171, 172, 173
 Nasîr b. Kâlibûm, treasurer, 58
 Nasîr, Bâlî-nâ-, sie Bâlî
 Nasron mines 43, 304
 Navarre 231
 Nawfal b. el-Furât, treasurer, 50
 Nawrâz, emîr, 334, 335
 Nazareth 220, 227, 267
 Nefisa, Sulta, 115, 195, 261; inscr.
     117
 Nevers, Count of, 222
 Nicephorus, emperor, 159
 Niğde 335
 Nights, Thousand and One, 251
 Nikau 4, 8, 9, 21, see John of Nikau
 Nikosia 337
 Nile festival 86, 301
 Nilometers 26, 43, 63, 65, 112, 217
 Nizâm-el-mülk 341
 Nizâr, el-Mu'tâfa 162
 Noules, mamlûk, 245
 en-No'mâa 187, 188
 en-No'mâa, 11m., 119
 Normans in Sicily 138
 Nubia 5, 6, 15, 21-23, 27, 41, 42,
     83, 105, 129, 143, 197, 271, 282,
     299, 308, 320
 Nâr-ed-dîn 174-177, 193, 196-199, 204, 242, 283
 Nâr-Jahân 255
 Naçeyrlî (Ançevîya) 308 en-Naweyrlî, historian, 265, 269, 296, 298
 Oases 304
 Okeydal ib. el-Mâhdî 95-97
 Okeydalîb et-Tarsusî, marshal, 54
 Okeydal ib. b. el-Hâjjâbî, treas.,
     27, 47
 Okeydal ib. b. el-Mâhdî, gov., 53
 Okeydalîb b. el-Mâhdî, Fâtîmid
     general, 98
 Okeydalîb b. en-Sari, marshal and
     governor, 36, 56
 Okeydalîb ib. Zeynelî, gov., 54
 Observatory 131
 Officers of state 43, 155, 156, 247;
     of the army 342
 'Oktâ b. 'Amîr, vice-governor, 45;
     governor 46
 'Oktâ b. Masâma, vice-gov., 47
 'Oktâ b. No'sîm, marshal and vice-governor 48
 'Okeyl b. el-Mo'âzz 114
 'Okeyl, Arab tribe, 106
 'Okeylids 159
 Oman, C. W., 223, 236
 'Omar, second caliph 1, 10-15, 20;
     mosque of 227
 'Omar, gov., 35
 'Omar, Taâfi-ed-dîn, Ayyûbid, 213
 'Omar b. Ghaylân, treasurer, 52
 'Omar see el-Mughîth
 'Omâra 186, 193, 197, 198
 Omâyâd caliphs 24, 26; visit
     Egypt 29; government 18 ff.;
     rebellion 33
 Omâyâd caliphs of Cordova 123,
     128
 'Omeyr b. el-Welîd, governor, 56
 Ordûtegi Khâfûn, mosque, 276
 Orontes 160
 Ortukids 164, 229
 Osâma b. Munkâdh 171, 172, 174, 175
 Osâma b. Zeyd, treasurer, 25, 26, 47
 'Oiba b. Ali Sulayân, governor, 45

'Othmân, third caliph, 23, 24
 'Othmân, el-Mansûr, 341, 342
 'Othmân b. Keys, kâdi, 45
 'Othmûnî sultana 332, 334, 337,
     338, 345-348, 352-357
 Oxen 135

PAINTINGS 27, 74, 111
 Palace, striped, 315
 Palaces of Cairo 109, 110
 Palestine 105, 106, 159, 160, 161,
     163-165, 173-178, 185, 190, 192,
     193, 205, 207-211, 217-219, 224-
     225, 258, 259, 352
 Parasol of state 249
 Passports 27, 281
 Patriarch, Armenian, 170; Coptic,
     2, 26, 27, 66, 119, 127, 143, 144
 Pay office 157
 Peacock 148
 Pearl Palace 123, 125
 Pelagius, cardinal, 212
 Pelusium (el-Faramâ) siege 2, 82; road to Cairo 223
 Pensions 145
 Pepper monopoly 340
 Perfume-burner 302
 Perrieres 234
 Persia 264, see Ilkhâns
 Persian artists 111, 112
 Perwâna 270, 271
 Peter of Lusignan 320
 Philip Augustus 210, 222
 Philip VI 310
 Philoxenos 15
 Physicians 70, 157, 168
 Pictures, sacred, 27, see Paintings
 Pigeon post 246, 280
 Pigs in Nubia 167
 Pilgrim Castle (Mons Perigrinus)
     218
 Pirates 335, 336
 Plague 97, 101, 104, 136, 143, 146,
     216, 289, 318, 320, 328
 Poets 142, 157, 188, 249
 Poll tax 5-7, 12, 15, 19, 25, see Taxes
 Polo 167, 247, 264, 292
 Polo-bearer 247
 Poor-tax 25, 71
 Popes 217, 218, 225, 228, 241, 310

Population 6, 15, 28, 29
 Ports see Alexandria, Damietta,
     Bûlak, Kelzum, Kuseyr, Mâks,
     Sawâlikin; access to Christian 270
 Portuguese 350, 352
 Post 246, 264
 Pottery 112, 141, 147
 Presents 108, 109, 273
 Prima (Hirim) 197
 Princess Royal (Seyyid-el-mulk)
     120, 134, 139
 Prisoners 337
 Prize-money 337
 Progresses, state, 141, 248-250, 292, 299
 Provinces of Egypt 152, 157
 Pyramids 203

QUADRANTS, solar, 323
 Quarries, stone, 304
 Quatremere, E., 3, 36, 92, 117, 242,
     263, 265, 269, 276, 281, 282, 296,
     311
 Queens, Muslim, 255, see Sheger-ed durr
 Quicksilver lake 75
 Quince-cider 89

RABWA, inscription, 117
 Races, intermixture of, 15, 29
 er-Râdî, 'Abbâsîd caliph, 82 er-Râfiqa 68, 73
 Râkî, Ibn-, 83
 Raisins 126
 er-Râkka 66, 67, 68, 73, 84, 160
 Ramadân 123, see Fasting
 Ramadân principality 335
 er-Ramâ 72, 78, 105, 106, 159, 164,
     165, 205, 210, 211, 218
 Ransom 337
 Ra's-Nawba 247
 er-Rashid, usurping caliph, 159
 Râshida mosque 129
 er-Rastan, battle at, 84
 Rasûlids of Yemen 308, 339, 340
 Rayân 113, 114
 Raymond, count of Tripoli, 199,
     205, 207
 Red Sea 192, 350, 352
 Regent 341

Reginald, of Châtillon 207, 208
 Rent of houses 139, and shops 140
 Rest-houses 76, 101
 Restoration of mosques 302
 Resurrection, church of the, 128, 136, 143, 160
 Revenue of Egypt 6, 19, 25, 36, 65, 66, 151
 Reyhanîya troops 168
 Rhinoceros 122
 Rhodes, knights of, 320, 338
 Richard I 209-211, 213, 220
 Richard of Cornwall 231
 Ruf (de la) 10, 15
 Riqqa 255
 Robert, count of Artois 234, 235
 Robes 103, 265
 es-Rodja (or Rawda) island 7, 43, 63, 108, 141, 166; castle 237, 243, 253; madrasa 323
 Rogers, F. T., 60
 Roman architecture 153
 Romans, East (al-Kûm), 2-13, 20, 21, 23, 36, 41, 70, 74, 114, 120, 147, 159, 192, 201
 Rosetta 350
 Rudolf of Habsburg 281
 Rudwîn, Selîm, 163
 Rudwân, wezir, 152, 169
 er-Kûm see Romans, East
 Rumîya regiment 155
 Russik b. Falâ', wezir, 176
 Russik, Ibn-, see Talâ'

 SABIN, Ibn-, 226
 Sabra 98
 Sacrifice, Feast of, 2, 13, 41
 Sa'd el-A'sar, general, 72, 73
 Sadaka 137
 Saude cloth 249
 Safed 230, 267, 306, 329
 Salwân, Ibn-, governor of Karak, 68
 Sa'id, Ibn-Abî, governor of Anbâr, 73 es-Sâhbâ, Abû-, b. Hassân, marshal, 51
 Sâlih 306
 es-Sâib b. Hishâm, marshal, 45, 46; kâdi 46 es-Sâ'id (Upper Egypt) 20, 22, 24, 30, 33, 34, 41, 66, 88, 192, 259 es-Sâ'i id see Baraka
 Sa'id, Ibn-, 140, 240
 Sa'idî, Yezid, governor, 46
 Sakha 9, 32, 38
 Sâki 247
 Salâdin (Salâh-ed-din) 139, 140, 169, 173, 177, 178, 181-183, 185-186, 188, 190-211, 212; inscriptions 190
 Salîr, emir, 294-296, 298, 300, 302, 304-306; madrasa and tomb 276 es-Sâ'îd, Ibn, wezir, 171, 174, 188
 Sale of government 329 es-Sâlih Ayyâb 220, 230, 231, 237, 241, 243, 255, 257, 258, 263; madrasa and tomb 243 es-Sâlih Ismâ'il son of 'Adil, 229, 230, 238
 es-Sâlih see Talâ'
 Sâlih b. 'Ali, 'Abbâsul general, 30, 31, governor 50
 Sâlih b. Mirdâs 159, 160
 es-Sâlih b. Nâr-ed-din 199, 200, 206
 Sâlih b. Shîrâd, treasurer, 56
 Sâlih b. 'Abd-el-Kârim marshal, 54 es-Sâlihiya 257
 Sâim b. Sawâda, governor, 51
 Sâmarâ 63, 65, 69, 73
 San'â 197
 Sanga 41
 Sanhâga Berbers 107, 137
 Saphadîn (Seyf-ed-din) see el-'Adil
 Sarai 308
 Sardâniya 107
 Sarghitmish, emir, 318; mosque 276
 es-Sâ'îd b. el-Ulakam, governor, 55
 Sârikhad 292, 330
 Sarrasin, J. P., 235
 Sarûg 160
 Satin 249
 Sawâkin 272, 308, 339, 350
 Schisms in Islam 31, 38, 39
 Science, Hall of, 264
 Secretaries 247
 Seâmith, el-'Adil, 277
 Selim I, Osmanî, 352-355
 Selim, Ibn-, 21
 Selgiiks 139, 143, 160, 161, 163-165,

242 ; of Rûm 196, 199, 206, 229, 266, 271, 274
Sememud 9, 32, 238
Sengar el-Gâwâl, mosque, 276, 314
Sengar esh-Shugû I 288, 289
Severus, bishop of Ushmuneyn, 119
Seville 266
Seyl-ed-dawla 84, 85, 87
Seyl-ed-Din 199, 200
Seyyidelel-mulk 130, 134, 135
Sha'bân see el-Ashraf
Sha'bân, el-Kâmil, Bahri sultan, inscr. 277
esh-Shâhîshî 187
Shâfi'î, Imâm, 204 ; tomb 212, school of 31, 39, 188, 204
Shâh Siwâr 347
Shakkâb 298
Shârûf Khânum (buttery) 248
Sharmesâ 233
Shâtar, wedr, 176-180
Shawbex (Montreal) 257, 272, 300, inscr. 277
Sheger-ed-darr, Queen, 237-239, 242, 255-258, 260, 261
Shekenda 271
Shekîf Arnûn (Belfort) 230, 268
Shemamun, k. of Nubia, 282
Shemsîya 112
Sherîf 106, 108, 159, 272, 337
Sheylân, son of Ibn-Tâlûn 76, 77
Sheykh el-Islâm 327
Sheykhs, village, 18
Sheykhû, 318 ; mosque 276, 314
Sheyzar 72, 159, 160 ; inscr. 277, 324
Shî'a, 31, 92 ff., 104, 115, 130, 132, 138, 191
Shibboleth, Egyptian, 300
Shîrûda 15
Ships, Arab, 23, 71
Ships 121, 155, see Fleet
Shirkûh, general, wedr, 177-186
Shops 140, 141 ; title-deeds 59
Shu'eyb b. el-Ilâmid, marshal, 47
Sicily 97, 111, 112, 138, 174, 198, 226, 266, 281
Sidon 163, 217, 267, 287, 335
Siege engines 234
Sigilmâsa 96, 99
es-Sîlîf, theologian, 188
Siîhdâr 247, 290
Silk 112, 249
Sîmâ et-Tawîl 66
Sînâ 159
Sîs 270
Sîwâs 332
Slav regnient 155
Slave revolt 136
Slavonic 90
Slipper-bearer 247
Society 251, 252
Spain, immigrants from, 35, 36 ; raid on 212
Sport 250, 267, 316
Sources of the chem ver 166
Stamps on glass bottles 27, 44, 47, 53, see hat of illustrations Steps, Gate of the, 201
Sûdân 5, 6, 15, 21-23, 27, 41, 42, 88, 105, 129, 143, 197, 271, 282, 290, 308, 320
Sûdân queen-mother 137, 244
Sudan troops 63, 110, 113, 132, 133, 141, 145, 146, 151, 155, 168, 173, 192, 197
Sûdûn, emir, 323
Suez 304
Sûfîs 314
Sugar-cane 312
Sohey 237
Sûk-ed-dik 240
Sûk-en-Nâhâsîn 85, 109, 314
es-Sukkara pavilion 142
Sûkmârî 164
Sûleyhids 138
Suleym b. 'Ir, treasurer and kâdi, 45
Suleymân b. Ghâli, marshal, 54 ; governor 55
Suleymân b. es-Sâmma, marshal, 53
Salphur springs 26
Sultan, dunes of, 246-250
Sûteys 15
Sumptuary laws 126, 127, 301
Sunkur, el Kâmil, 278
Sunnîs 31
es-Suyûti, historian, 142
Swallows, omen from, 295

Swimming 250, 270
 Sword makers, college of, 173, 204
 Swords, famous, 148
 Syria 66, 82, 158-165, 201-211, 225, 231, 266, 270, 295-299, 329, etc., passes
 Syrian troops 150, 151, 164

TABARI 247, 249 et-Talari, historian 5, 6, 8, 10, 45, 133, of 149
 Tal'atid family 108
 Tal-i-khanah 248
 Tabor, Mt., 218; inscription 212
 Taby see 'Atabu
 Taghazhan Tu ks 60
 Taghribi-Berdi, medresa, 323
 Tihān 97
 Tihār, Abū-, c. Arqāb Khālī 52
 Talat' b. Razzik, ex-Sanh, vezir,
     173, 175, 176, 177, 189; mosque
     187, 276, 302; inscription 276
 Tamweyh 26
 Tarabiyah 304
 Tartur 60, 66, 70, 73, 75, 76, 80,
     82, 88, 336, 346, 348
 Tüshtemir 318; mosque 276
 Taster 247
 Tāt-i, et-Zāhir, Burqī sultan, 336
 Tatars see Mongols, Golden Horde et-Tawāhid (The Mills) 72
 Taxes 5, 6, 12, 15, 19, 25, 43, 66,
     71, 90, 114, 143, 151, 166, 273,
     291, 303, 304, 312, 344, 349
 Taybars, medresa, 276
 Tayy, Arab tribe, 106, 113
 Tekbir 11
 Tekin el-Khissa, governor, 79, 80, 82
 Tekrit 191
 Tell-G'eter 203
 Temim b. el-Nofizz 114, 140
 et-Temimi 187
 Templars, knights, 172, 205, 219,
     225, 234, 235, 267, 279, 286, 287,
     299
 Tendūnyās, conquest, 3, 4
 Tents, royal, 148, 249, 250
 Terenuthis 10
 Teutonic knights 219

 eth-Thāfir 129
 Thenand, Jehan 195
 Theodora, empress, 143
 Theodosius, prefect angustal, 9, 10
 Theodosius, dux of Thebaid, 3
 Theophanes 7
 Thomas, L., 348
 Tibenay 208, 230
 Timur (Tamerlane) 331, 334
 Timurbugha, c. Zāhir, Burqī sultan, 325, 341
 Tink-e, tomb, 276
 Tinus, 9, 41, 52, 106, 112, 114,
     151, 165, 174
 Tish-i-khanah 248
 Title-deeds of shops 59
 Titles, mamluk 353
 Tökülmish 332
 Tomb-mosques see mosques
 Tor 304
 Turon (Tubnīn) 217
 Tortosa (Antaradus, Antartūs) 163,
     269, 277
 Torture 68, 84, 288, 329
 Touching for sickness 283
 Tower, Red, 261
 Trade 240, 266, 303, 313, see
     Custom dues
 Trade, Indian, 339, 340, 350, 352
 Treasure, buried, 66, 86; of Fāti-mids 111, 147, 148, 285, 307
 Treasurer 18, 19, 45-58, 65, 77
 Treasury 156
 Treaty of Misr 5, 6; with Nubians
     21-23; with Amalric 179-181;
     between Ikhshid and Ibn-Rā'iq
     83; Ikhshid and Seyf-ed-dawla
     85; with European powers 266,
     279, 281
 Tribute 7, 11, 15, 22, 23, 41, 65,
     69, 83, 85, 87, 304; from Cyprus
     338; to Jerusalem 177
 Tribute of slaves see Bakt
 Tripolia (Barbary) 68, 107, 138, 308
 Tripolis (Syria) 114, 158, 159, 163,
     165, 208, 217, 218, 227, 266, 269,
     281, 306, 320, 329, 335, 336;
     inscriptions 277, 324
 Truffles 122
 Tul & b. Nekîr, kādī, 48

Tubnîn (Taron) 217
 Tughî 82, see Ikhshîd
 Tughril Beg 143, 160
 Tughtegin 165
 Tulbiya 308; tomb 276
 Tulugma tactics 279
 Tûlûn, Ahmed ibn, governor, 26,
 60-71, 304; mosque 195, 292
 Tûmân-Bey el-'Adîl, Burgh sultan, tomb, 323; inscription 324
 Tûmân-Bey el-Ashraf, Burgh sultan,
 334, 355; inscription 324
 Tunis 308, 337
 Tûrânshâh, Ayyûbid, 197
 Tûrânshâh b. eç-Şâlih, Bahri sultan 237-239
 Turbans 122, 148, 280
 Turcopoles 182
 Turkish governors 30, 33, 42, 82;
 guard 242; language 341; troops
 37, 115, 125, 132, 133, 137, 141,
 145 ff., 151, 252
 Turkomans 177, 197, 271, 279,
 310, 330, 335, 337, 345, see
 Selgûks
 Turkomans of the Black Pelt 332
 Turkomans of the White Pelt 346
 Turuqtâi 285
 Tustar 137, 148
 Tutush, Seigûk, 161, 163
 Tilzûn 84
 Tyre 159, 161, 163, 165, 208, 210,
 246, 267, 268, 281, 287
 Tzumisces 114
 UIRAT TATARS 294, 295
 Ukbuwâna 160
 Ulqâitû, Ilkhân, 299
 Umbrella bearer 156
 Umm-Duneym or Denîn 3
 Üngür Abû-l-Kâsim b. el-Ikhshîd
 86, 87
 Ushmûm, canal of, 233
 Ushmuneys 80, 114, 119, 173
 Ustâd (Ustâdh) 87, 124
 Ustâddâr 247
 Ustâddâr-es-Suhba 248
 Uzbegs 308
 Uzbek, emir, see Ezbek
 Ozûn Hasan 346, 347
 VENETIANS 320, 337, 340; treaties with 218, 240
 Vestury 248
 Viceroy 247, 261, 288
 Victory, Gate of, see Bâb-en-Nâşr
 Vines 226
 Vizier see wezir
 Vogüé, Vic. de, 190
 Volga 265, 308
 Wâdî, governor, 51
 Wâdî-el-Khâtînâdîr 295
 Waiting at funerals 43
 Wakf 177
 el-Wâki'dî, historian, 3, 13
 Walls of Cairo 117, 140, 152, 190, 201
 War, Holy, 207 ff., 217 ff., 231 ff.
 Wardan 6
 el-Wâsi'î 61
 Wealth 111, 121, 127, 165, 185,
 307, 313
 Wedding expenses 316
 Weights, glass, 44, 47-53
 Weil, G., 242, 269, 272, 276, 310,
 317, 348
 Wekâlas 323, 344
 el-Wejîd b. Rîsâ'a, marshal 47;
 governor 48
 Well of the Winding Stairs 203
 Wezir 99, 101, 104, 117, 120, 121,
 124, 128, 142, 144, 155, 166,
 177, 180, 247
 Wezir, Abu-l-, treasurer, 57
 Wezirs, palace of, 121, 193
 William Longsword 235
 William of Tyre 177, 181, 182, 201
 Winchester, earl of, 222
 Wine 26, 43, 126, 251, 273, 288,
 297, 312, 348
 Women, regulations affecting, 43,
 126
 Woollen stuffs 112
 Wüstenfeld, F., 24, 92, 117, 122,
 154, 304
 YÂFA see Jaffâ
 Ya'kûb b. Killis, wezir, 107, 114,
 120, 121
 Ya'kûbî 19

Vânis 84
 Vânis, vezir, 167
 Yaḥyâ b. Meymûn, kâdî, 47, 48
 Yazmûn 73
 Vâzîr 165
 el-Vâzîrî, vezir, 111, 137, 142-143, 148
 Vel-Bey, ez-Zâhir, Bûngî sultan, 341
 Veilâghâ, emîr, 318, 330
 el-Venîm 123, 138, 197, 220, 257,
 272, 308, 310, 320, 339
 Veshlîk, emîr, 334; palace 323
 Veshkûr, hâl, 63
 Vezîr b. 'Abdallâh, gov., 42, 57
 Vezîr b. Hâim, marshal, 50
 Vezîr b. Hâim, governor, 32, 50
 Violante, heiress of Jerusalem, 225
 Vule, Sir H., 269
 Vînîs, marshal, 50
 Vînîs b. 'Ayyâ, marshal and kâdî, 46
 Yusuf, el-'Aziz, 341
 Yusuf, Zeyn-ed-din, tomb-mosque, 270
 ez-Zîrî, Fâtimid caliph, 170, 171, 173
 ez-Zâhir, Fâtimid caliph, 134-136, 138, 159
 ez-Zâhir, son of Saladin, 213, 214, 215
 ez-Zâhir see Barkûk, Beybars, Gâlk-mâk, Khûshkadam, Tâtar, Timur-bulghîl, Vel-Bey
 Zâhirî mamloks 278
 Zawila gate 117, 262, 289, 326, 355
 Zelad 107
 Zenizem 145
 Zengî 69
 Zengî, Mûteg of Mûşî, 173, 174,
 191
 Zengids 199, 200, 206, 207, 214
 Zeyd b. 'Abd-el-'Azîz, marshal, 53
 Zeyn-el-Âlâdin, mosque, 63
 Zeyneb, Ibn-, governor, 54
 Zeynos 107
 Zîmâmlârs 247
 Zîyâdat-Adâb 95
 Zotenberg, H., 4
 ez-Zubeyr 3, 5, 6
 ez-Zubeyr, Ibn-, 158
 Zubeyr see Bahâ-ed-din
 Zülâk, Ibn-, 187
 Zunnâri 249
 Zar'a 128
 Zuwayla Gate see Zawila

A CATALOGUE OF BOOKS
PUBLISHED BY METHUEN AND COMPANY: LONDON
36 ESSEX STREET
W.C.

CONTENTS

PAGE		PAGE
General Literature, . . . . .	2-24	Little Library, . . . . .	32
Ancient Cities, . . . . .	24	Little Quarto Shakespeare, . . . . .	33
Antiquary's Books, . . . . .	25	Minature Library, . . . . .	33
Arden Shakespeare, . . . . .	25	New Historical Series, . . . . .	34
Beginner's Books, . . . . .	26	New Library o. Medicine, . . . . .	34
Business Books, . . . . .	26	New Library of Music, . . . . .	34
Byzantine Texts, . . . . .	26	Oxford Biographies, . . . . .	34
Churchman's Bible, . . . . .	26	Romantic History, . . . . .	34
Churchman's Library, . . . . .	27	School Examination Series, . . . . .	35
Classical Translations, . . . . .	27	School Histories, . . . . .	35
Classics of Art, . . . . .	27	Simplified French Texts, . . . . .	35
Commercial Series, . . . . .	27	Simplified German Texts, . . . . .	35
Connoisseur's Library, . . . . .	28	Six Ages of European History, . . . . .	36
Handbooks of English Church History, . . . . .	28	Standard Library, . . . . .	36
Illustrated Pocket Library of Plain and Coloured Books, . . . . .	28	Textbooks of Science, . . . . .	36
Junior Examination Series, . . . . .	29	Textbooks of Technology, . . . . .	37
Junior School-Books, . . . . .	29	Handbooks of Theology, . . . . .	37
Leaders of Religion, . . . . .	30	Westminster Commentaries, . . . . .	37
Library of Devotion, . . . . .	30
Little Books on Art, . . . . .	31
Little Galleries, . . . . .	31
Little Guides, . . . . .	32
		Fiction, . . . . .	37-45
		Books for Boys and Girls, . . . . .	45
		Novels of Alexandre Dumas, . . . . .	46
		Methuen's Sixpenny Books, . . . . .	46

MARCH 1910

A CATALOGUE OF MESSRS. METHUEN'S PUBLICATIONS

In this Catalogue the order is according to authors. An asterisk denotes that the book is in the press.

Colonial Editions are published of all Messrs. Methuen's Books bound at a price above 1s. 6d., and similar editions are published of some works of General Literature. Colonial editions are sent for circulation in the British Colonies and India.

All books marked net are not subject to discount, and cannot be bought at less than the published price. Books not marked net are subject to the discount which the bookseller allows.

Messrs. Methuen's books are kept in stock by all good booksellers. If there is any difficulty in getting copies, Messrs. Methuen will be very glad to have early information, and specimen copies of any books will be sent on receipt of the published price plus postage for one copy, and of the published price for ordinary books.

L.P.L. represents Illustrated Pocket Library.

PART I.—GENERAL LITERATURE

Abraham (George D.), "THE COMPLETE NOVELIST." 16 vols.; Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.
Academy (Madame). See Junior School Books.
Addleshaw (Percy). SIR PHILIP SIDNEY. With 12 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.
Adney (W. P.), M.A. See Bennett (W. H.).
Ady (Cecilia M.). A HISTORY OF MEXICO UNDER THE SPANISH. With 21 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.
Aeschylus. See Classical Translations.
Alderson (W. Macrae). See F.—
Aldis (Janet). THE QUEEN OF LETTER WRITERS. Marquise de Sévigné, Dame de Bouvilliers, 1626-96. With 11 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.
Alexander (William). D.D. Archibishop of Armagh. 1400 GUGHTS AND COUNTS OF MANY YEARS. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.
Alken (Henry). See L.P.L.
Allen (Charles G.). See Textbooks of Science.
Allen (L. Jessie). See Little Books on Art.
Allen (J. Romilly), F.S.A. See Antiquary's Books.
Almack (E.), F.S.A. See Little Books on Art.
Amhurst (Lady). A SKETCH OF EGYPTIAN HISTORY FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE PRESENT DAY. With many Illustrations and Maps. A New and Cheaper Issue. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.
Anderson (P. M.). THE STORY OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE FOR CHILDREN. With 16 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 2s.

Anderson (J. G.), B.A., NOUVELLE GRAMMAIRE PRATIQUE ALLIAGEE DES ÉCOLES ANGLAISES. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.
ANNALES DE GRANDMAISON FRANÇAISE. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
Anderson (Edward). PRECIES PRIYATAE. Translated and edited, with Notes, by F. R. BRICKHORN, M.A., of Pusey House, Oxford. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
See also Library of Devotion.
'Anglo-Australian.' AFTER-GLOW MEMORIES. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Anon. THE BUDGET, THE LAND AND THE PEOPLE. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo. 1d. net.
HEALTH, WEALTH, AND WISDOM. Crown 8vo. 1s. net.
THE WESTMINSTER PROBLEMS BOOK. Prose and Verse. Compiled from The Saturday Westminster Gazette Competition, 1894-1902. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.
VENICE AND HER TREASURES. With many Illustrations. Second Edition. Prog. 8vo. 3s. net.
Aristotle. THE ETHICS OF. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes by JOHN BURKE, M.A., Cambridgeshire. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.
Asmann (H. N.), M.A., D.D. AN INTRODUCTION TO THE HISTORY OF ROME. With Maps and Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. See also Senior School Books.
Atkins (H. G.). See Oxford Biographies.
Atkinson C. M.L., EKELMY B.C. TAHAM. Demy 8vo. 2s. net.
Atkinson (C. F.), M.A., Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, sometime Deacon of Magdalen College. A HISTORY OF GERMANY, from 1783 to 1883. With 35 Maps and Plans. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

GENERAL LITERATURE

3

Architecture (T. G.). ENGLISH ARCHITECTURE. With 37 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. pp. 64. net.

▲ A GLOSSARY OF TERMS USED IN ENGLISH ARCHITECTURE. With 60 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. pp. 64. net.

Advertiser (A. H.). NAPOLEON'S BROTHERS. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. pp. net.

Adrian (T. J., M.A., F.S.A.) See Ancient Cities.

Aurelius (Marcus). WORDS OF THE ANCIENT WISE. Thoughts from Epicurus and Marcus Aurelius. Edited by W. H. D. Rouse, M.A., LL.D. Demy 8vo. pp. 64. net.

See also Standard Library.

Ames (Janet). See Standard Library. Little Library and Minion (G. E.).

▲ Avon (F. Ernest). CO-OPERATIVE INDUSTRY. Crown 8vo. pp. net.

Banbury (Friends). See Standard Library and Little Library.

Bassett (Richard). THE LAKES OF NORTHERN ITALY. With 37 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo. pp. net.

Bentley (J. C.), M.A. See Cooper (W.).

Bern (R. Michel). THE LAST KING OF POLAND AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES. With 36 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. pp. 64. net.

Barker (W. G.), M.A. See Junior Economic Series.

Barker (Julian L.A. F.L.C., F.C.S.) See Books on Domestic.

Battiss (Gordon). THE LIFE OF ROBERT DE STAFFORD. With a Portrait. Fourth Edition in one Volume. Cr. 8vo. Duxbury, £1.

Battiss (A.), B.A., LL.B. See Antiquary's Books.

Batty (E. H.). See Commercial Series.

Bearman (R. H.). See Little Library.

Bearse (The Hon. Mansfield), WITH THE RUSSIANS IN MANCHURIA. Third Edition. Demy 8vo. pp. 64. net.

▲ A YEAR IN RUSSIA. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. pp. 64. net.

RUSSIAN ESSAYS AND STORIES. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. pp. net.

Also published in a Colonial Edition.

Bertram-Gould (S.). THE LIFE OF NAPOLEON BONAPARTE. With nearly 100 Illustrations, including a Photographic Frontispiece. Second Edition. Wide Royal 8vo. £6. 16s. net.

THE TRAGEDY OF THE CESARS. A Story of the Characters of the Cesars of the Julian and Claudian Houses. With numerous Illustrations from Busts, Coins, Cameos, etc. Second Edition. Royal 8vo. £2. 16s. net.

▲ A BOOK OF FAIRY TALES. With numerous Illustrations by A. J. Gaskin. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. Duxbury, £1.

OLD ENGLISH FAIRY TALES. With numerous Illustrations by F. D. Bedford. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. Duxbury, £1.

THE VICAR OF STOK WENSTOW. Revised Edition. With a Preface. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. pp. 64.

OLD COUNTRY LIFE. With 37 Illustrations. Fifth Edition. Large Crown 8vo. £1.

▲ A BOOK OF SONG BY SING. English Folk Songs with their Traditional Melodies. Collected and arranged by S. Baring-Gould and K. P. Susanna. Demy 8vo. £1.

SONGS OF THE WEST: Folk Songs of Devon and Cornwall. Collected from the Mouths of the People. By S. Baring-Gould, M.A., and H. Fleetwood Swinnerton, M.A. New and Revised Edition, under the General Editorship of S. J. Baker. Large Impression. 5s. net.

▲ A BOOK OF NURSERY SONGS AND RHYMES. Edited by S. Baring-Gould. Illustrated. Second and Cheaper Edition. 1s. 6d. net.

STRANGE SURVIVALS: Some Chapters in the History of Man. II volume. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. pp. 64. net.

YORKSHIRE ODDITIES: Incidents and Strange Events. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. pp. 64. net.

THE BARING-GOULD SELECTION READER. Arranged by G. H. Rose. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.

THE BARING-GOULD CONTINUOUS READER. Arranged by G. H. Rose. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.

▲ A PRACTICAL KNIFE. With 33 Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

▲ A BOOK OF DARTMOOR. With 60 Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

▲ A BOOK OF DEVON. With 33 Illustrations. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

▲ A BOOK OF NORTH WALES. With 49 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

▲ A BOOK OF SOUTH WALES. With 47 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

▲ A BOOK OF BRITTANY. With 69 Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

▲ A BOOK OF THE RHINE. From Cleve to Mainz. With 8 Illustrations in Colour by Trevor Haddon, and 48 other Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

▲ A BOOK OF THE RIVIERA. With 47 Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

▲ A BOOK OF THE PYRENEES. With 49 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

See also Little Guides.

Beauchamp (Alfred F.). See Treatise of Technology.

Bentley (F. J. M.). A Glad Folio of Works. College, Oxford. THE POLITICAL THOUGHT OF PLATO AND ARISTOTLE. Demy 8vo. pp. 64. net.

Benson (W. E.), D.D. See Chancery's Books.

Berwickshire. P. & J. See Little Library.

Beyen (R. R. N.), M.A. FRENCH PROSE. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 7s. 6d. Key. 1s. net.
See also Junior School Books.

Benson (H. M.), M.A., Wadham College, Oxford. TEXTS FOR SERMONS. With a Preface by Canon HENRY HOLLAND. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Berthoinat (J.). Q. & Q. PARK. See Little Library. Cr. 8vo.

Besant (W. T.). THE STORY OF THE WORLD OF NATIONS. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Besant (W. T., and H. M. D. FARR). THE STORY OF THE WORLD OF NATIONS. Illustrations and many Photomicrographs. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Besant (Mrs. Stephen). A CONCISE HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH FLOWERS. Proprietary. 3s. 6d.

THE SUMMER GARDEN OF PLEASURE. With 36 Illustrations — Colour by OSWYNNE FITTMAR. 1s. 6d. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Beyly (G. L.). THE COMPLETE BOOK OF COOKERY. With over 1000 Receipts. Note on Sweet Colour Plates. Proprietary. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Board (W. B.). EASY EXERCISES IN ALGEBRA FOR BEGINNERS. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. With Answers. 1s. 6d.
For other books on Elementary Maths and Science see page 10.

Brickett (Arthur). THE SPIRIT OF THE DOWNS: Impressions and Reminiscences of the Sussex Downs, and Downland People and Places. With 20 Illustrations in Colour by STANLEY INCHBOLD. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Chadford (Peter). THOUGHTS ON HUNTING. Edited by J. OTIS PAGE, and Illustrated by G. M. JALLAND. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 6s.

Chadford (William). See Little Library.

Chandler (H. G.), M.A., Cours de Washington. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Chapman (May). A BOOK OF CARICATURES. Imperial 4to. 1s. 6d. net.

Chaplin (Harriet). MASTER WORKERS. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Chalmers (Jacob). DIalogues on the SUPERSENSUAL LIFE. Edited by BERNARD HOLLAND. Proprietary. 1s. 6d.

Chell (Mrs. Arthur G.). THE SKIRTS OF THE GREAT CITY. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by ARTHUR G. CHELL, 12 other Illustrations, and a Map. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Chelles (E.) PARIS. With 7 Maps and a Plan. Proprietary. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

HILLS AND THE SEA. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

ON NOTHING AND KINDRED SUBJECTS. Third Edition. Proprietary. 1s. 6d.

ON EVERYTHING. Second Edition. Proprietary. 1s. 6d.

MAISIE AND MISTRESS. Writing, Pictures, and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

THE PYRENEES. With 40 Sketches by the Author and 10 Maps. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Bellot (H. H. L.), M.A. See Isaac (L. A. A.).

Bennett (Joseph). FIFTY YEARS OF MUSIC, 1863-1913. With 40 Illustrations. Large 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Bennett (W. H.), M.A. A PRIMER OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Bennett (W. H.) and Adeney (W. F.). A BIBLICAL INTRODUCTION. With a Concise Bibliography. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Benson (Architect). GOES BOALS. Commons Address. Second Edition. Proprietary. 1s. 6d.

Benson (A. C.), M.A. See Oxford Biographies.

Benson (R. H.). THE WAY OF HOLINESS. An Exposition of Psalm and Analytical and Devotional. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Bernard (E. R. J. M. A.). Canon of Sacraments. Imperial 4to. 1s. 6d.

Berry (W. G.). How to Buy a BIBLE. With 16 Illustrations and Maps. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Bertram (A. de). See Classics of Art.

Betham-Edwards (Mabel). MOUNTAINS IN FRANCE. With 40 Illustrations. Fifth Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Bethune-Baker (J. P.). See Little Library.

Bingham (F. G. S.). THE OCEAN. Imperial 4to. 1s. 6d. net.

Blair (John). With Introductions and Notes. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Bliss (M. B.). THE LIFE OF WALT WHITMAN. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Bliven (Mrs. Lawrence). NINETEENTH CENTURY PROSE. Selected and arranged by. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Blow (Lawrence). THE DEATH OF A MAN AND OTHER POEMS. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.
See also Blake (William).

Boyle (Walter de Gray), M.D., F.R.C.P. See Cassell's Library.

Burnet (Ethel). See Little Books on Art.

Buckminster (Bernard). See I.P.L.

Blair (Robert). See I.P.L.

Blake (William). THE LETTERS OF WILLIAM BLAKE, together with a LIFE BY FREDERICK TATMAR. Edited from the Original Manuscripts, with an Introduction and Notes, by ROBERT DE BURKE. Proprietary. 1s. 6d. net.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE BOOK OF PSALMS. With General Introduction by L. C. Scott. Second Edition. 1s. 6d. net.
See also I.P.L., and Little Library.

Bloom (J. Harvey), M.A. See Antiquity's Poets.

Blouet (Honoré). See Englishmen's Books.

Bordeneuve (T. H.), M.A. See French (W.).

Bode (Wilhelm), Ph.D. See Classics of Art.

Bradley (J. P. C.) THE CORONATION OF EDWARD VII. Demy 8vo. 1s. net. By Command of the King.

Brady (George), D.D. THE SOUL'S PILGRIMAGE. De Quincey's Essays from his Private Note-Books, and a Life of George Eliot. In 2 vols. With an Introduction by J. H. Green, B.D., F.R.S. & F.B.A. Demy 8vo. 1s. net.

Bona (Cardinal). See Library of Devotion.

Bonner (Mary L.). See Little Books on Art.

Bone (F. C.), B.A. See Modern Books.

Bonrow (George). See Books.

Borg (J. Ritschmann). A Practical Treatise on the Construction of Bridges. Translated by J. R. A. WORTH DAVIS, M.A. With 135 Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Bottling (C. O.), B.A. EASY GREEK EXERCISES. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

See also Junior Exercises in Greek.

Bouillet (W.) TASSO AND HIS TIMES. With 42 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Boutton (E. G.), M.A. GEOMETRY ON MODERN LINES. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Boutton (William B.) MR. JOSHUA REYNOLDS, P.R.A. With 40 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Bovill (W. B. Forster). HUNGARY AND THE HUNGARIANS. With 36 Illustrations in Colour by WILLIAM FORSTER, 10 other Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Bowditch (E. M.). THE Imitation of Nature. Poems from Buddhist Literature for each Day in the Year. Fifth Edition. Cr. 16mo. 1s. 6d.

Bower (E.), B.A. See New Historical Series.

Bovye (W.). CHRISTMAS AT THE ZOO. With Verses by W. BOVYE and 24 Coloured Pictures by M. B. Nissen. Super Royal 16mo. 1s.

Brockway, F. G. & H. A. BAMBLES IN SUSSEX. With 30 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s. See also Little Gull.

Bradbury (A. G.). ROBINSON CRUSOE TWILIGHT. With 14 Illustrations, in Colour by T. C. GOTTMAN, 16 other Illustrations, and a Map. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE ROMANCE OF NORTHUMBERLAND. With 36 Illustrations in Colour by FRANK BOYNTON, R.B.A., and 12 from Photographs. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Brentley (John W.). See Little Books on Art.

Braud (Jules). Open Champion, 1902, 1903 and 1906. ADVANCED GOLF. With 20 Photographs and Diagrams. Fifth Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Braud (Jules) and Others. GREAT GOLFERS IN THE MAKING. Edited by HENRY LEADER. With 16 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Brougham (H. B.). MACEDONIA. Its Past and Present Future. With 30 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Brown (G.). See Simplified German Text.

Brynjulfsson (F. B.), M.A. See Anthology (Lancelot).

Bredick (Mary) and Norton (A. Anderson). A CONCISE DICTIONARY OF EGYPTIAN ARCHAEOLOGY. A Handbook for Students and Travellers. With 16 Illustrations and many Corrections. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Breeding (H. H.), B.Sc. (Rosedale), Lancaster Municipal Technical School, and James (W. H. N.), A.M.I.E.E., A.R.C.S. Municipal School of Technology, Mansfield. See Textbooks of Technology.

Brown (S. H.), M.A., B.Sc., Senior Science Master at Uppingham. A PRACTICAL GUIDE TO THE MATRICULATION AND ARMY CANDIDATES. Early Experiments on the Commando Submarine. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Brown (J. Wood), M.A. THE BUILDERS OF FLORENCE. With 74 Illustrations by HENRY LEADER. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Brown (Sir Thomas). See Standard Library.

Brownell (E. L.). THE MEET OF JAPAN. (Illustrated by A. Adams.) Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Browning (Robert). BROWNING'S PARACELSUS. The Text of Browning's Poem, edited with Introduction, Footnotes, and Bibliography, by MARGARET L. LEE, Lecturer in English Literature to the Women's Department, King's College, and Editor of The Browning Society's Journal. See also Little Library.

Bryant (Walter W.). A HISTORY OF THE ROYAL OBSERVATORY. With A HISTORY OF ASTROPHYSICS. With 42 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Buckland (Francis T.). CULLEN'S OF NATURAL HISTORY. Illustrated by H. B. NEILSON. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Buckland (A. M.). THE BURDEN OF ENGELE. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

EAGER HEART: A Mystery Play. Eighth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

KINGS IN BABYLON. A Drama. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

SONGS OF JOY. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Budge (E. A. Waller). LIFE AND OF THE EGYPTIANS. With over 100 Coloured Plates and many Illustrations. Two Volumes. Reprinted. 6s. 6d. net.

Bust (W. Massie). THE COMPLETE AERONAUT. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Bull (Paul), Army Chaplain. GOD AND OUR SOLDIERS. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

MESSRS. METHEUER'S CATALOGUE

Bertrand (Miss P. A.). See Little Library.

Berzon (H. B. S.), M.A. FRENCH PROSE
FOR CHILDREN. Fourth Edition. Cr.
8vo. pp. 64. 1s. 6d. net.
See also Junior School Books.

Bertram (H. M.), M.A., Wadham College, Oxford. TEXTS FOR SERMONS. With a Preface by Canon Scott Holland
Cr. 8vo. vi. 6d.

Bertie-Atkins (A. G.). FABLE. See
Robertson (C. D.).

Bentall (C. P.), LL.B. THE COM-MUNION OF NATIONAL SOCIETY. Cr.
8vo. 1s. 6d.

Bertram H. L. Bertram, R.A. AND F. J.
THOMAS. THE COLOUR BOOK. With Diagrams and Many Photomicrographs.
Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Bethune Mrs. Stephen. A DAY IN N.Y.C. THE GARDEN FLOWERS
Frag. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

THE SUMMER GARDEN OF PIERRE DE RONSARD. With a Translation and Colour by OSWALD PITTMAN. Wide Demy
8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Beyley (R. CHM.). THE COMPLETE
PHOTOGRAPHER. With over 100
Illustrations. With Notes on Direct Colour Process. Fourth Edition. Demy 8vo.
6d. net.

Beadle (W. S.). EASY EXERCISES IN ALGEBRA FOR BEGINNERS. Cr. 8vo.
1s. 6d. With Answers. 1s. 6d.
See also Junior Examination Books and Beginner's Books.

Bennett Arthur. THE SPIRIT OF THE LAW. An Interpretation and Application of the Spirit of the Law of International Finance and Finance. With an Introduction by Sir Ernest Renan. Second Edition.
Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Bennetts' Pictures. MEMENTOES ON
THE CHILD. Drawn by J. OTTO FAGET, and Illustrated by G. H. JALLAND. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 6d.

Bentford (William). See Little Library.

Bescheching (K. C.), M.A. Canon of Westminster. See Library of Devotion.

Besuchet (Max). A BOOK OF CAR-
ICATURES. Imperial 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

Besudis Harold. BAYARD WILDE.
Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Bethune Jacob. THE LIFE OF A FATHER. By J. B. Bethune and Mrs. Bethune. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Beth (Miss Arthur G.). THE SKIRTS
OF THE LAW AT THE END OF THE PENNY. Drawn by Arthur G. Beth, and Illustrations from a Map. Second Edition. 1s. 6d. net.

Belleau (M.) PARIS. With 7 Maps and a Photographic Portfolio. Second Edition.
A Large Folio. 1s. 6d. net.

HILLS AND THE SEA. Second Edition.
Second Edition. 1s. 6d. net.

ON NATURE AND KINDRED SUB-JECTS. Third Edition. Frag. 8vo. 1s.

ON EVERYTHING. Second Edition.
First Edition. 1s.

MARIE ANTOINETTE. With Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

THE PRINTER'S WORKS. With a Foreword by the Author, and 20 Maps. Second Edition.
Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Ballet (H. H. L.). MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS
AND THEIR HISTORY. With 40 Illustrations.
Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Benard (W. H.), M.A. A PRIMER OF
THE BIBLE. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo.
1s. 6d.

Benovit (W. H.) and Abney (W. F.). A BIBLICAL DICTIONARY. With a concise Bibliography. Eighth Edition. Cr.
8vo. 1s. 6d.

Benson (Archbishop). GOD'S BOARD.
Consecration Address. Second Edition.
Frag. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Benson (A. E.), M.A. See Oxford Biographies.

Benson (R. M.). THE WAY OF HOLY LIVING. An Exposition of the New Analytical and Devotional. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Bernard (E. B.), M.A. Canon of Salisbury.
THE ENGLISH SUNDAY AND OCEAN
AND ITS CLAIMS. Frag. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Berry (W. Clinton), M.A. FRANCE
SINCE WATERLOO. With 16 Illustrations and Maps. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Bernets (A. de). See Classics of Art.

Betham-Edwards Maps. HOMELIFE
IN THE 18TH C. With 30 Illustrations.
Fifth Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Bethune-Baker (G. F.), M.A. See Hand books of Theology.

Bidder T. Herbert, LL.D. THE ECCL.
MINICAL DOCUMENTS OF THE FAITH. Ninth Edition. With an Introduction and Notes.
Large 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Biggs (H. B.). THE LIFE OF WALT
WHITMAN. Illustrated. Demy 8vo.
1s. 6d. net.

Bilby (Mrs. Lawrence). NINETEENTH CENTURY PROSE. Selected and organized by C. Crowe. 6s.

Bilby (Lawrence). THE GREAT OF ASIA AND OTHER POEMS. Cr. 8vo.
1s. 6d. net.

Bilby (Lawrence). WADDELL.
Oliver Walter de Grey, LL.D. F.R.A.
See Little Library.

Birrelling (T. B.). See Little Library Art.

Birkbeck (Bessie). See I.P.L.

Birkbeck (Isabel). See I.P.L.

Birkbeck (Isabel). THE LETTERS OF WILLIAM BIRKBECK. Translated from a Large 8vo. French Version. Printed from the Original Manuscript, and an Introduction and Notes, by ARTHUR G.
B. BIRKBECK. With 10 Illustrations.
Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE BOOK OF
OB. With General Introduction by LAURENCE BILBY. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.
See also I.P.L., and Little Library.

Bloom (G. Harvey), M.A. See Antiquary's Books.

Blousat (Homer). See Homer's Books.

Boardman (T. H.), M.A. See French (W.).

Bode (Wilhelm), Ph.D. See Classics of Art.

Boerley (J. E. G.). THE CORONATION OF EDWARD VII. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.
By Command of the King.

Bode (George), L.L.B. THE SOUL'S PILGRIMAGE: Devotional Readings from the "selected and spiritual writings of George Bode, D.D. Selected and arranged by J. R. Bunn, B.D., F.R.A.S." Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Bona (Cardinal). See Library of Devotion.

Bonner (Mary L.). See Little Books on Art.

Bone, F. C. B.A. See Commons Series.

Bonrow (Georgie). See also THEATR

Bosq. See also ZOOLOGY. Translated by J. R. ANTHONY DAVIS, M.A. With 25 Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Bottling (C. O.), B.A. EASY GREEK EXERCISES. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

See also Junior Examination Series.

Boulling (W.). TASSO AND HIS TIME: With 24 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Boulton (B. B.), M.A. GEOMETRY ON THREE DIMENSIONS. 1s. 6d.

Boulton (William B.). SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS, P.R.A. With 49 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Bovill (W. B. Forster). HUNGARY AND THE HUNGARIANS. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by WILLIAM PASCOE, 16 other Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Bowden (E. M.). THE ILLUMINATION OF RUDRAKA: Being Quotations from Buddhist Literature for each Day in the Year. Fifth Edition. Cr. 16mo. 1s. 6d.

Bower (E.), B.A. See New Minstrel Series.

Boyle (W.). CHRISTMAS AT THE ZOO. With Verses by W. BOYLE and 24 Coloured Pictures by H. B. NEALSON. Super Royal 16mo. 1s.

Bowring (F. G.), M.A. RAMBLES IN SUSSEX: With 24 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 1s. See also Little Guides.

Bowley A. G. & CO. LTD. NOTWITHSHIRE. With 24 Illustrations, in Colour by T. C. BOYCE, 16 other Illustrations, and a Map. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE ROMANCE OF NORTHUMBERLAND. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by FRANK SOUTERAGE, R.D.A., and 11 with Photographs. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Bowley, John W. See also Books on Art.

Brown (James). Open Champion, 1905, 1906 and 1907. See also Books on Art. With 20 Photographs and Diagrams. Fifth Edition. Demy 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

Bryant (James) and others. GREAT CIVILISATIONS IN THE MAKING. Large

by MORLEY LEACH. With 54 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

Bristol (M. N.). MACEDONIA: ITS RACES AND THEIR FUTURE. With 32 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Brockhaus (C.). See Simplified German Texts.

Brightman (F. H.), M.A. See Andrews (Lancelot).

Broadick (Mary) and Mortiss (A. Anderson). A CONCISE DICTIONARY OF EGYPTIAN ARCHAEOLOGY. A Handbook for Students and Travellers. With 26 Illustrations and many Corrections. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Brooks (W. E.), B.Sc. (Lond.). Leicester Municipal Technical School; and James (W. H. M., A. M. I. & E. R., A. R. C. I.). Municipal School of Technology, Manchester. See Textbooks of Technology.

Brown (S. E.), M.A., B.Sc., Senior Science Master at Upminster. A PRACTICAL CHEMISTRY NOTE-BOOK FOR MATHEMATICAL AND PHYSICAL

EXPERIMENTS ON THE COMMON SUBSTANCES. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Brown (J. Wood), M.A. THE BUILDERS OF FLORENCE. With 72 Illustrations by MARGARET BAXTER. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Browne (Sir Thomas). See Shakespeare Library.

Browne (G. L.). THE HEART OF JAPAN. Illustrated. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. Also Meditation Books. 1s. 6d.

Browne (John). See also Books on Art.

Browne (Margaret). See also Books on Art. PARACELSIUS. The Text of Browne's Poem, edited with Introduction, Footnotes, and Bibliography, by MARGARET L. LEE. See also Books on Art. Introduction to the Women's Department, King's College, and KATHARING E. LOOCK. Poetry 8vo. 3s. 6d. net. See also Little Library.

Bryant (Walter W.), B.A. FRASER'S LIBRARY OF THE ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND. 1s. 6d.

Buckland (Frederick). See also Books on Art. PRIMER OF NATURAL HISTORY. Illustrated by H. B. NEALSON. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Buchanan (A. M.). THE BURDEN OF ENGLAND. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

EAGER HEART: A Mystery Play. Eighth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

KINGS IN BABYLON: A Drama. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

SONGS OF JOY. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Burge & Co. See also Books on Art. THE EGYPTIANS. With over 200 Coloured Plates and many Illustrations. Two Volumes. Royal 8vo. 6s. 6d. net.

Bullock (R. Hargrave). THE CONTEMPORARY AERONAUT. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Bull (Paul). Army Chaplain. GOD AND OUR SOLDIERS. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Bellay (Elise). See Diderot (Lady).

Benayon (John). THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. Ed. 52. Edited, with an Introduction, by G. H. PARKER, M.A. With 50 Illustrations by R. ANTHONY BELL. Crown 8vo. 6s. See also Standard Library and Library of Devotion.

Benn G. J., M.A., F.R.S. A MANUAL OF ELECTRICAL SCIENCE. Illustrated. Cr. 8vo. 3s.

Bergess (Gebert). COOPS AND HOW TO KEEPS THEM. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s. See also Standard Library and Library of Devotion.

Burn A. E., D.D., Author of Mankind and Preminary of Leckfield. See Hand Books of Theology.

Burn (J. H.), B.E., F.R.S.E. THE CHURCHMAN'S TREASURY OF SONG: Gathered from the Christian Poetry of all ages. Edited by Prof. Dr. J. H. Burn. See also Library of Devotion.

Burnet (John), M.A. See Arsenic.

Burns (Robert). THE POETS. Edited by AVENEL LANG and W. A. CRAVEN. With Portrait. Third Edition. Wide Demy 8vo. 6s. 1777-1800. See also Standard Library.

Burnside (W. F.). A OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY FOR USE IN SCHOOLS. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 2s. net.

Burton (Alfred). See P.L.

Bury (J. H.), M.A. Litt. D. See Church History.

Chesterton (G. K.). CHRISTIANITY AND CRIME AND CRIMINAL PROBLEMS (The Hampstead Lectures of 1909). Demy 8vo. See also Standard Library.

Butler (Joseph), B.D. See Standard Library.

Butille (P. M.). AMONG THE DANES. With illustrations in colour by E. A. WILKINSON, and 15 from Photographs. Demy 8vo. 10s. net.

Cain George, Author of the Cambridge UNIVERSITY WORKS IN ENGLISH. Translated by A. R. ATTENBOROUGH, M.A. With a Frontispiece in Colour by MAXWELL AXMFIELD, and 20 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Calecott (Alfred), D.D. See Handbook of Theology.

Caldwood (D. S.). Headmaster of the Normal School, Edinburgh. TEST CARDS IN EUCLID AND ALGEBRA. In Three parts of 50, with Answers, 2s. each. Or in Two parts of 25, 1s. each.

Cameron Mary Lovett. MELATHEMIA AND MELIERN. CANTE. With 15 Illustrations. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

Carman (Edwin), M.A. See Smith (Adam).

Carne (George). See Library of Devotion.

Carver E. F. M.A. See Oxford Biographies.

Carson (Robert W.). THE CITY OF JESUO. With 20 Illustrations in Colour by WILLIAM PARKINSON, and 10 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Cartwright (John). See I.P.L.

Cartyle (Thomas). THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. Edited by C. R. L. PLATTNER. Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. Three Volumes. Cr. 8vo. 12s. THE LITTLE SAINT SPENSER OF OLIVER CROMWELL. With an Introduction by G. H. PARKER, M.A., and Notes and Appendices by Mrs. & C. L. LUCAS. Three Volumes. Demy 8vo. 10s. net.

Carter (R. M. and A. J.), M.A. See Leaders of Religion.

Carmichael (Philip). ALL ABOUT PHILIPPINE. With 8 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Carpenter (Margaret Bayley). THE CHILD IN HIS WORKS. Second Edition. Large Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Carter (George), M.A. THE STORY OF MILTON'S 'PARADISE LOST.' Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Cavendish (Frances), M.D. (Edn.). See New Library of Medicine.

Celano (Brother Thomas of). THE LIVES OF FRANCIS OF ASSISI. Translated by A. G. FENNER HOWELL. With a Frontispiece. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Chapman (A. M.). A CRITICAL-HISTORICAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Charnock (A. Webb). See Simplified German Texts.

Chardine (Archibald). Works of Bishop Chardine. A.F.R.C.S. An Essay in Biblical Folklore. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s. 6d. net.

Chambers (C. C.) and Roberts (H. B.). LACE-MAKING IN THE MIDLANDS PAST AND PRESENT. With 17 full-page Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Chapman (S. J.). See Books on Business.

Charteris (Thomas). See Standard Library.

Chesterfield (Lady). THE LETTERS OF THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD TO HIS SON. Edited, with an Introduction by C. STRACHEY, with Notes by A. CALTHROP. Two Volumes. Cr. 8vo. 12s.

Chesterton (G. K.). CHARLES DICKENS. WITH PORTRETS IN PHOTOGRAPH. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

ALL THIS I CONSIDERED. FIVE TERRIBLE TRAGEDIES. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Chiles Charles F. L. B.A., F.R.C.S. See New Library of Medicine.

Chilton J. M. A Professor of Chemistry in the University of London. THE WORLD'S AND WEST INDUSTRIES. With 20 Illustrations and Diagrams. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Clarke F. A. C.M.A. See Leader of Religion.

Clifford (George), A.R.A., R.W.S. SIX LECTURES ON PAINTING. With 50

Illustrations. Third Edition. Large Part Demy 3s. 6d. net.

AIMS AND IDEALS IN ART. Eight Lectures delivered to the Students of the Royal Academy of Arts. With 30 Illustrations. Second Edition. Large Part Demy 3s. 6d. net.

Clay (Ruthra Murray). See Antiquary's Library.

Chester (A. L.). See Wagner (R.).

Church (G.), F.C.S. See Antiquary's Library.

CloUGH (W. T.) and DUNSTAN (A. E.). See James Stuart Davis and Tomatoes of Dunstan.

Clouston T. R. M.D. C.C.D., F.R.S.E. See New Library of Medicine.

Clelland - Brock. SHELLEY: THE MAN AND THE POET. With 8 Illustrations. Demy 2s. 6d. net.

Comet (W. G.), M.A. EXAMINATION PAPERS IN VERGIL. Cr. 6s. or

Cobb (W. F.), M.A. THE BOOK OF PSALMS: with an Introduction and Notes. Demy 2s. 6d. net.

Cockshott (Winnifred), St. Hilda's Hall, Oxford. THE PILGRIM FATHERS; THEIR CHURCH AND COLONY. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 2s. 6d. net.

Cottage and (W. G.), M.A. THE LIFE OF A RUSKIN. With Poem. Second Edition. Cr. 6s. or 6d. net.

Caillie (W. H.), M.A. See Chetham's Library.

Carroll (Lewis H.) ST. TERESA OF JESUS. With 16 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 2s. 6d. net.

Carrie (William). See P.L.

Carey (Joseph). THE HISTORY OF THE VATICAN. Memories and Impressions. Third Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Carré, A. M., M.A., and Marshall, W. C. B. M. A. PRACTICAL LATIN TRANSLATION. Selected from Latin and Greek Literature. Fifth Ed. Cr. 6s. 6d. or

LATIN PASSAGES FOR UNSEEN TRANSLATION. Cr. 6s. 6d. or

Casson, Taylor (H. W.), M.A. THE FACTORY SYSTEM. Cr. 6s. 6d. or

Cattell (W. A.), M.A. THE ALPS. With many Illustrations. Demy 2s. 6d. net.

Cawson, C. S. L. F. R. S. II. S. See Weston (W. P.).

Cochran (Albert). See L. & L. Books on Art.

Cotes (Rosemary). DANTE'S GARDEN. With a Frontispiece. Second Edition. 7s. 6d. net. 12s. 6d.; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

BIGELOW FLOWERS. With a Frontispiece and Plan. Peap. 6s. or 6d. net.

Cotton (Charles). See I.P.L. and Little Library.

Cowper, G. O. L. CHAUCER AND HIS ENGLAND. With 30 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 2s. 6d. net.

Cowley (Abraham). See Little Library.

Cowper, William. THE PFAFF. Based upon an Introduction and Notes by J. C. Barker, M.A. Illustrated, including ten unprinted designs by WILLIAM BLAKE. Demy 2s. 6d. net.

Cox, J. Charnock. See Ancient Cities, Antiquary's Library, and Latin Classics.

Cox (Harold), B.A., M.P. LAND NATIONALISATION AND LAND TAXATION. Second Edition revised. Cr. 6s. 3s. 6d. net.

Crabbe (George). See Little Library.

Craik (Mrs.). See Little Library.

Craw (C. P.), D.S.O. See Little Guides.

Crown (Walter), R.W.S. AN ARTIST'S LIFE & SCIENCES. With 223 Illustrations by the Author and others from Photographs. Second Edition. Demy 2s. 6d. net.

INDIA IMPRESSIONS. With 84 Illustrations from Sketches by the Author. Second Edition. Demy 2s. 6d. net.

Crofton (Richard). See Little Library.

Cross (J. E. K.) RELIGION AND LIFE OF A K.C. With a Portrait. Second Edition. Demy 2s. 6d. net.

Crozer (J. A.), M.A. THE FAITH OF THE BIBLE. Peap. 6s. 6d. net.

Crowley (Ralph H.). THE HYGIENE OF SCHOOL LIFE. Cr. 6s. 3s. 6d. net.

Crothshank (G.). THE LOVING BALAD OF LORD BATEMAN. With 16 Plates. Cr. 26mo. 1s. 6d. net.

Crum (B.). See Wagner (R.).

Crittall (C. T.), M.A. Causes of Peterborough. See Handbook of English Church History.

Cunningham (H. H.), C.B. See Cunningham's Library.

Curtis, J. L., F.R.D. See Leaders of Religion.

Davall (G. W.), M.A. See Leaders of Religion.

Dante (Alighieri). LA COMMEDIA DI DANTE. The Italian Text edited by FABRE TOYNBEE, M.A., D.Litt. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE DIVINE COMEDY. Translated by M. F. CAVE. Edited with a Life of Dante and Introductory Notes by FABRE TOYNBEE, M.A., D.Litt. Demy 2s. 6d.

THE PURGATORIO OF DANTE. Translated into Spenserian Prose by C. GUERRA-WARREN. With the Italian text. Peap. 6s. or 6d. net.

See also Little Library, Toynbee (Peter), and Vernon (Hon. W. Warren).

Darley (George). See Little Library.

D'Arcy W. F., M.A. A NEW TRIGONOMETRY FOR BEGINNERS. With numerous diagrams. Cr. 6s. 3s. 6d.

Daudet (Alphonse). See his Complete French Library.

Davenport (Cyril). See Carpenter's Library and L. & L. Books on Art.

Davenport (James). THE WASHINGTON FAMILY. With 16 Illustrations and a Map. Royal 8vo. 6s. 6d.

Davray (Richard). THE PAGEANT OF LONDON. With 40 colour scenes, 16 Comedies, 16 Tragedies, 8 L. & L. Peap. 6s. or 6d. net.

See also Romantic History.

Darton (Harold H.). See Complete Art,

MESSRS. METHUEN'S CATALOGUE

Berling (W. G. D.). See Junior Berlings.

Bertrand (F. W. C.). Follow and Tally or Bertrand's ENGLAND IN THE NORMANS AND ANGEVINS: With Maps and Illustrations. Second Edition. Pp. viii + 400. Large 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Bergen (Niels). See Copenhagen's Library.

Besant (Mrs. Barbara). See Little Besants A.L.

Besant (A. C.). See Little Library.

Besant (Henry G.). THE TRIALS OF FIVE JESUITES: Accusation of ARAGON, ANNE BOLEYN, MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, MARIE ANTWERPPE and CAROLINE OF BRUNSWICK. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Besant (Mabel). A CHILD'S LIFE OF CHRIST. With 8 Illustrations in Colour by E. Poerbaeck-Buccleach. Large Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Beste (Margaret). IN THE CANARIES WITH A CAMERA. With 50 Illustrations, of which one is in Colour, from Photographs by Mrs. R. M. King, and a Map. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Belbas (Lion). THE METRIC SYSTEM. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Bonaparte AGAINST CONON AND CALCILEA. Edited by F. Bonaparte Bussy, M.A. Second Edition. Pp. xvi. 1s.

Bishop (Charles). See Little Library. I.P.L., and Chesterton (G. K.).

Bishop (Emily). POEMS. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Bishop (G. L. M. A.). Flower of Love, V. 18 (CANTERBURY). THE LIFE Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Bishop (Lady), Bulley (Miss), and Whitley (Miss). WOMEN'S WORK. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Bisson (Edward), M.A. See Copenhagen's Library. See Books on Art, and Classes of Art.

Bitchfield (R. H.), M.A., F.S.A. THE HISTORY OF AN ENGLISH TOWN. With an Introduction by Augustus Jessop D.D. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. OLD ENGLISH CUSTOMS: Remains of the Present Time. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

ENGLISH VILLAGES. With 20 Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

THE PARISH CLERK. With 32 Illustrations. Third Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

THE OLD-TIME PARSON. With 27 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Bloom W. MA. MA. A PRIMER OF TENNISON. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

English Poetry from BLAKE to BROWNING. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Bobbe (W. J.). M.A. See Teachers of Science.

Bompy (H.). SONGS OF THE SEA. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

Douglas (Hugh A.). VERICLE ON POET. In the history of the English Poet. With 72 Illustrations and 12 Maps. Pp. 120. 1s. 6d.

Douglas (James). THE MAN IN THE FLY. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Dowden (J. J. D.D.). Lord Bishop of Rochester. FURTHER STUDIES IN THE BIBLE. Pp. 112. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

See also Churchman's Library.

Dreys (G.). See Books on History.

Drexler (J. R. F. D., D.C.L.). Regius Professor of Hebrew in the University of Oxford. KERMONS OR SUBJECTS CONNECTED WITH THE OLD TESTAMENT. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

See also Copenhagen's Library.

Dreyfus (Wanda). See Little Library.

Dubois (A. E.). See Little Library.

Duff (Horat). MATILDA OF TUSCANY. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Duguid (Charles). See Books on History.

Dumas (Alexandre). THE CHANCELLOR. THE BORGIAS AND OTHERS. With an Introduction by H. E. Gaskins. With 5 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. THE CRIMES OF URBAIN GRANGER AND OTHERS. With 4 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. THE CRIMES OF THE MARQUISE DE BRINVILLIERS AND OTHERS. With 5 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. THE CRIMES OF ALI PACHA AND OTHERS. With 5 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. MY MEMOIRS. Translated by E. M. Waller. With an Introduction by Andrew Lang. With 5 Illustrations. Pp. 120. In six Volumes. Cr. 8vo. 1s. each volume. Vol. I. 1810-1816. Vol. IV. 1830-1834. Vol. II. 1812-1815. Vol. V. 1831-1836. Vol. III. 1816-1821. Vol. VI. 1836-1838. MY PETS. Newly translated by A. R. Alcock. M.A. With 16 Illustrations by V. Lacoste. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

See also Simplified French Texts.

Durant (John). L.D. THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF HERBERT SPENCER. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s.

Dunn (J. D., D.Sc., and Mandell (V. A.). GENERAL ELEMENTARY SCIENCE. With 160 Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Dunn-Hartford (D. P.). WARM BONE MARKS (A. S. Type of Restoration). Demy 8vo. Second Edition. 1s. 6d. net.

Dunstan (A. G., B.Sc.). Handy Textbooks of Science, and Junior School Books. Dunstan The Electrified & ILLUMINATED CANVAS. A. W. 1s. An Introductory Memoir. 1s. 6d. net.

Dunn W. A. THE YOUTH'S POLK BROADSIDE. With colored Illustrations by Frank Brangwyn, R.R.A. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

WILD LIFE IN EAST ANGLIA. With 16 Illustrations in colour by FRANK SOUTHCATE, R.D.A. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

SOME LITERARY ASSOCIATIONS OF EAST ANGLIA. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by W. DEXTER, R.R.A., and 26 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
See also Little Guide.

Querieden, Bishop of Schleswig. MECRE COSMOGRAPHIE, OR A PIECE OF THE WORLD IN BLOVERDA. And some more.

Quinton, Major J. W. B. T. D. A. Q. M.C. See Wood (W. Birkbeck).

Edwards (Clement). THE LORE OF THE HONEY BEE. With 24 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Edwards (Clement), M.P. RAILWAY NATIONALIZATION. Second Edition, Revised. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

Edwards (W. Douglas). See Commercial Series.

See also Phœnix. See I.P.L.

Egerton (F. P. S. L.A.). A HISTORY OF BRITISH COLONIAL POLICY. Second and Revised Edition. 3 vols. 18s. net.

Hobby (G. G.). See I. & C. 18s. net.

See also F. P. S. L.A. 18s. net.

Epictetus. See Aurelius (Cassius).

Erasmus. A Book called in Latin ENCHIRIDION MILITIS CHRISTIANI, and in English the Manual of the Christian Knight. Facs. See 2s. 6d. net.

Erasmian-Chrisitian. See Enchiridion Texts.

Eusebius. See Byzantine Texts.

Everett-Green (Mary Anne). ELIZABETH AND PHILIPPA AND QUEEN OF BOHEMIA. Revised by her Niece S. C. LOWMEYER. With a Preface by A. W. WARD, LL.D. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Ewald (Carl). TWO LEGS, AND OTHER STORIES. Translated from the Danish by ALFREDERIK THOMSEN, M.A. Master. Illustrated by ANNASTA GRETZ. Large Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Ezekiel. See Westminster Commemorative.

Fawcett (M. T.), B.A. See Junior Examination Books.

Fairbrother (W. H.), M.A. THE PHILOSOPHY OF T. H. GREEN. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Fau (Alfred). THE FLIGHT OF THE KING. With over 70 Sketches and Photographs by the Author. New and revised Edition. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

EDUCATION CHARTS AND MAPPING-PLATES. Third and enlarged edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

JAMES II. AND HIS WIVES. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Fall, E. A. THE FOUNDATIONS OF LIBERTY. Cr. 8vo. 3s. net.

Fawcett (Fiona). See Little Books.

Fidler (C. Chilton), M.I.M. C.S. See Books on Business.

Fleming (Henry). See Standard Library. Price 3s. 6d. M.A. See Junior Examination Books.

Firth J. R. J. See Little Guide.

Firth (C. H.), M.A. BEGINNERS' HISTORY OF ENGLAND. Stories of Oxford. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. A HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH SOLDIER during the Civil War, the Commonwealth and the Protectorate. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Firth (Edith E.). See Beginner's Books and Junior School Books.

FitzGerald (Edward). THE RUDĀIYĀT OF OMAR KHAYĀM. Printed from the Fifth and last Edition. With a Commentary by MR STEPHEN BATSON, and a Biography of Omar by E. D. COOK, A.F.S. See, Mr. See also Miriâzî Library.

FitzGerald (H. P.). A CONCISE HANDBOOK OF CLIMBERS, TWINERS, AND WALL SHRUBS. Illustrated. Fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

Fitzpatrick (S. A. O.). See Ancient Cities.

Flecker (W. H.), M.A., D.G.L. Headmaster of the Dean Close School, Cheltenham. THE STUDENT'S PRAYER BOOK. THE TEXT OF MORNING AND EVENING PRAYER AND LITANY. With an Introduction and Notes. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Fletcher (G. H. L.), M.A. See Gothic 18s. —

Fletcher (J. B.). A BOOK OF YORKSHIRE. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by WALTER PAGE and FRANK SOUTHCATE, R.D.A., 16 other Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Finch (A. W.), M.A. William Dow Professor of Political Economy at the University, Montreal. ECONOMIC PRINCIPLES. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Finn (P. W. O.), D.Litt., M.A. A LONG-LOST RELIC OF THE VEDAS. WITH CERTAIN ZENS. With Plans and Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Ford (H. G.), M.A. Assistant Master at Bristol Grammar School. See Junior School Books.

Foxell (A.). THE SENSES OF INSECTS. Translated by MARGO VEARSLY. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Fortescue (Mrs. G.). See Little Books on Art.

Fouqué (Le Matin). SINTRAM AND MARY (LUMPFAN 1878). Translated by A. C. PARQUINSON. With 16 Illustrations by KARLOV J. B. and a Frontispiece in Photogravure from an engraving by ALFREDUS DÜRR. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Half-White Fellow. See, 6d. net.

See also Simplified German Texts.

Fowler (J. P.). ROUND THE WORLD ON A WHEEL. With 16 Illustrations. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

French (W.), M.A. See Textbooks of Science. Principia Mathematica. 8s. 6d. 1893. LA MYSTÉRIE TRILOGIE. A Short Manual for Students. Translated by J. R. GREENWOOD. Price 3s. 6d. Junior Schools. Second Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Grey (C. W.) GERMAN PASSAGES FOR UNSEEN TRANSLATION. Cr. 8s. 6d. net.

Grey (P. L.), B.Sc. THE PRINCIPLES OF MAGNETISM AND ELECTRICITY. With 100 Diagrams. Cr. 8s. 6d. net.

Grove (G. B.) WILSON, M.A., late Fellow of St. John's College, Oxon. NOTES ON GREEK AND LATIN SYNTAX. Second Edition, revised. Cr. 8s. 6d. net.

Grenville (A.H.J.), F.R.S. A HISTORY OF ROME. From the Tribunes of Tiberius Gracchus to the end of the Jugurthine War, B.C. 133-86. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Gregory (Miss H. C.). See Library of Devotion.

Gruith (H. C.). See Textbooks of Technology.

Gwynne (Stephen), M.P. A HISTORY OF CONNEMARA. With 36 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hagfield (R. A.) and Olding (H. de B.). A SHORTER WORKING DAY. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hall (Cyndd). THE YOUNG CARPENTER. With many Diagrams, and 15 Full-page Coloured Plates. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hall (Hammond). THE YOUNG ENGINEER: OR MODERN ENGINES & THEIR MODELS. With 83 Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hall (Mervyn). A NICE JOURNEY FROM THE CAPE TO CAIRO. With 64 Illustrations and a Map. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hamel (Frank). FAMOUS FRENCH SALONS. With 30 Illustrations. Third Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hannay (D.). A SHORT HISTORY OF THE ROYAL NAVY. Vol. I. 1537-1658. Vol. II. 1658-1883. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hannay (James O.), M.A. THE SPIRIT AND LIFE OF CHRISTIAN MONASTICISM. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

THE WISDOM OF THE DESERT. Proprietary.

Hartley-Brown. See Commissioner's Library.

Hare (A. T.), M.A. THE CIVILISATION OF LAYMAN INDUCTIVE COURSES. With 35 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 6s.

Harker (Alfred), M.A., F.R.S., Fellow of St. John's Coll. and Lecturer in Petrology in the University of Cambridge. THE NATURAL HISTORY OF IGNEOUS ROCKS. With 122 Diagrams and a Plate. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Harper (Charles G.), 'THE ATTOMAT' READ IN K. In four Volumes. Crown 8vo. Each 1s. 6d. net.

Vol. I.—SOUTH OF THE TRADE.

Harvey (Alfred), M.B. See Ancient China and Antiquary's Books.

Hawthorne (Nathaniel). See Little Library.

Hawley (F. W.). DARWINISM AND MODERN SOCIALISM. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hawthorn (Frank R.). See Little Library.

Heath (Dudley). See Commissioner's Library.

Henderson (H. W.), Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford. THE LIFE AND PRINCIPLES OF THE EMPEROR NERO. Illustrated. New and enlarged issue. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

AT INTERVALS. Proprietary. 1s. 6d. net.

Henderson (M. Sturge). GEORGE MEREDITH: NOVELIST, POET, REFORMER. With a Portrait in Photogravure. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Henderson (T. F.). See Little Library and Oxford Biographies.

Henderson (T. F.), and Watt (Principals). SCOTLAND OF TO-DAY. With 30 Illustrations in colour, and 30 other Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Henley (W. E.). ENGLISH LYRICS: CHAUCER TO POE. 1s. 6d. net.

Henley (W. E.), and Whitney (C.). A BOOK OF ENGLISH PROSE, CHARACTER, AND INCIDENT. 1s. 6d. net. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Herbert (George). See Library of Devotion.

Herbert of Chichester (Lord). See Monastic Library.

Hett (Walter S.), B.A. A SHORT HISTORY OF GREECE TO THE DEATH OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT. With 3 Maps and 4 Plans. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Hewitt (W. A. S.), B.A. ENGLISH TRADE AND FINANCE IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Hewitt (Ethel M.). A GOLDEN DIAL. A Day Book of Poems and Verses. Proprietary. 1s. 6d. net.

Hoy (H. A.), Inspector, Surrey Education Committee, and Ross (G. H.), Head of Woodwork Teacher. A WOODWORK CLASS-BOOK. Pt. I. Illustrated. 6s.

Hoywood (W.). See St. Francis of Assisi.

H.A. (Clara). See Textbooks of Technology.

Hill (George Frederic), F.R.A.S. THE STERPIECES OF SCULPTURE. With 300 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hilli (History), B.A., Headmaster of the Boys' High School, Worcester, Capt. Curzon. A SOUTH AFRICAN ARITHMETIC. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Hoad (C. Lewis). DAYS IN CORNWALL. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by WILLIAM PARSONS, and 30 other Illustrations and a Map. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Hirst (P. W.). See Books on Business.

Hobhouse (L. T.), late Fellow of C.C.C., Oxford. THE THEORY OF KNOWLEDGE. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hobson (J. A.), M.A. INTERNATIONAL TRADE: A Study of Economic Principles. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

PROBLEMS OF POVERTY. An Inquiry

See also the Industrial Condition of the Poor.
Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

THE PLEBES OF THE UNION
PLOYED. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Imports & Exports. THE HISTORY OF RUSSIA IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. With 36 Illustrations. Two Volums. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hodgkin (T. A.) D.C.L. See Leader of Religion.

Hodgson (Rev. W.) HOW TO IDENTIFY OLD CHINESE PORCELAIN. With Illustrations. Second Edition. Part One. Cr.
Holden-Stans (G. G.). See Books in Business.

Homes of the Great in England. In Two Volumes. With 100 Illustrations and a Map.
Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Holworthy's BLACK ATLAS OF ENGLISH LAW. In Four Volums.
 Vols. I., II., III. Demy 8vo. Each
 1s. 6d. net.

Holland (Clive). TYROL AND ITS PEOPLE. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by ADRIAN STOKES, 36 other Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Holland (W. Scott), Canon of St. Paul's.
See Leader of Religion.

Hollings (M. A.), M.A. See The Ages of European History.

Holloway-Guthrie (H. G.), See of Dulwich College. Oxford: Bursar of Eton College.
PETRARCH: HIS LIFE, WORK, AND TIMES. With 36 Illustrations. Demy
 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Holmes (T. Scott), See Ancient Cities.

Holyoake (G. J.) THE CO-OPERATIVE MOVEMENT OF TO-DAY. Fourth Ed.
 Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Hone (Nathaniel J.), See Antiquary's Books.

Hooton (A.) HUMANITY AND ITS PROBLEMS. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Hopper See Little Gallants.

Horus. See Classical Translations.

Horsburgh (E. L. S.), M.A. *LORENZO
THE MAGNIFICENT AND HIS
TIME.* With 41 Illustrations and a Map.
Second Edition. Demy 8vo.
 1s. 6d.

WATERLOO. With Plans. Second Edition.
 Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
See also World War.

Horn (A. G.) Calculus of Probability.

Horus (P. F. T. D.) See Antiquary's Books.

Horne (Alexander), M.A. See Leader of Religion. Second Edition. Demy 8vo.
 1s. 6d. net.

How of Day in GREAT SCHOOL
MASTERS. With 12 Illustrations. *Second
Edition.* Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Howard (A. G.) Franciscan DAYS. Being Selections for every day in the year from ancient Franciscan writings.
 Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Howard (G. L.) TRADE UNIONISM—New and Old. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo.
 1s. 6d.

Hughes (Sir William), K.C.B., Q.M., D.C.L. &c.c. *THE SOCIAL POSITION
OF SCIENCE IN TWO YEARS AND IN TWO SCHOOLS.* With 36 Illustrations. Demy
 Royal 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hughes (G. E.) THE PRAYER OF LAKE DISTANCE. An English Anthology
With a Preface by George Lee.
 Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hugo (Victor). See Suspense Stories.

Hutton (Samuel F.), M.A. THE CITIES OF OXFORD IN FICTION. With 36
 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hume (Matthew), M.A. See Romance History.

Hutchinson (Horace G.) THE NEW FOREST. Illustrated in colour with 36 Pictures by WALTER TYNDALE and a Map by G. E. HORN. Second Edition.
 Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Hutton (A. W.), M.A. See Leader of Religion and Library of Devotion.

Hutton (Edward). THE CITIES OF UMBRIA. With 36 Illustrations in Colour
by A. PITA, and 26 other Illustrations. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

THE CITIES OF SPAIN. With 36 Illustrations in Colour, by A. W. RIMINGTON,
36 other Illustrations and a Map. *Third
Edition.* Cr. 8vo. 1s.

FLORENCE AND THE CITIES OF NORTHERN TUSCANY, WITH GENOVA. With 36 Illustrations in Colour by WILLIAM PARKERSON, and 16 other Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

ENGLISH COUNTRY PLACES. Based upon an Unpublished Survey. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

COUNTRY WALKS ABOUT FLORENCE.
 With 36 Drawings by ADELAIDE MARCHI and 36 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo.
 1s. 6d.

IN UNKNOWN TUSCANY. With an Appendix by WALTER HORN. With 36 Illustrations in Colour and 36 other
 Drawings. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

ROME. With 36 Illustrations in Colour by MAXWELL ARMSTRONG, and 26 other Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Hutton (W. W.), See Leader of Religion.

Hutton (W. W.), M.A. THE LIFE OF SIR THOMAS MORE. With Pictures and Drawings by MAXWELL. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

See also Leader of Religion.

Hyde (A. G.) GEORGE HERBERT AND HIS TIMES. With 36 Illustrations.
 Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Hyslop (F. A.) FLORENCE: HIS HISTORY AND ART TO THE FALL OF THE ARNO.
 Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Isaac (Matthew), BRAUD. A Drama.
 Translated by WILLIAM WAGSTAFF. *Third
 Edition.* Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Hugo (W. M.), M.A. Peller and Tugot, Or THE BAPTIST. (The Burmese Letters of Hugo.) Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.
See also Library of Devotion.

Jones (A. B.), M.A. A HISTORY OF THE BRITISH IN INDIA. With Maps and Plans. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

ENGLAND UNDER THE TUDORS. With Maps. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Jones (Mary). SCHOOLS OF PAINTING. With 51 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Jordan. See Churchman's Books.

Jackson (C. E.), B.A. See Tomes of Science.

Jackson (S.), M.A. See Commercial Series.

Jackson (F. Hamilton). See Little Guides.

Jacob (F.), M.A. See Junior Examination Series.

Jones (J. Stephen). TRUSTS, POOLS, AND CORNERS AS AFFECTING COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

See also Books on Business.

Johk (Camilla). A STAR OF THE SALONS: JULIE DE LESSEPS. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Johnson (Rogers), W. J. M. A HISTORY OF THE THIRTEEN COLONIES OF NORTH AMERICA 1697-1763. With 8 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Jeffreys (D. Gwyn). DOLLY'S THEATRICALS. Super Royal 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Jenkin (H.), M.A. B.C.L. AN OUTLINE OF ENGLISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT. Second Ed. Revised by R. C. K. Exon, M.A. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Jenner (Mrs. H.). See Little Books on Art.

Jennings (A. C.), M.A. See Handbooks of English Church History.

Jennings (Oscar), M.D. EARLY WOOD-CUT INITIALS. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Jerningham (Charles Edward). THE MAYTIME OF MARMADUKE. Third Edition. Peap. 8vo. 1s.

Jesus (Augustine), D.D. See Leaders of Religion.

Jevons (F. D.), M.A., LL.D., Principal of Houghton Hall, Durham. RELIGION IN EVOLUTION. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

See also Churchman's Library and Handbooks of Theology.

Johnson (A. H.), M.A. See Six Ages of European History.

Johnston (Sir R. H.), K.C.B. BRITISH CENTRAL AFRICA. With nearly 200 Illustrations and Six Maps. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Jones (H.), See Commercial Series.

Jones (H. P.). See Textbooks of Science.

Jones (L. A. Athorley), K.C., M.P., and Bellot (Hugh H. L.), M.A. D.C.L. THE MINER'S GUIDE TO THE COAL MINES REGULATION ACTS AND THE LAW OF EMPLOYERS AND WORKMEN. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

COMMERCE IN WAR. Reys/8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Jones (R. Coopson), M.A. POEMS OF THE INNER LIFE. Selected by. Thirteenth Edition. Peap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Jones (Sam). See Standard Library.

Jutting (Lady) of Warwick. BIBLICAL ILLUSTRATIONS OF LIVELY LOVE AND FRIENDSHIP. WARRACK. Third Ed. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Journal. See Classical Translations.

Kappa. LET YOUTH & TEACH. A Book for Readers in Education. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Kautsky (M.), M.A. SOCIALISM AND MODERN THOUGHT. Second Edition Revised and Enlarged. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Kants (John). THE POEMS. Edited with Introduction and Notes by E. de Salis. COURT, M.A. Work & PLEASURE IN PHASES. Second Edition Revised. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

REALMS OF GOLD. Selections from the Works of. Peap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

See also Little Library and Standard Library.

Kebble (John). THE CHRISTIAN YEAR. With an Introduction and Notes by W. Lock, D.D. Warden of Keble College. Illustrated by R. ANNING BELL. Third Edition. Peap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. furred surface, 1s.

See also Library of Devotion.

Kelynock (T. N.), M.D., M.R.C.P. See New Library of Medicine.

Kempt (Thomas), M.A. THE INITIATION OF CHRIST. With an Introduction by DEAN FARRAR. Illustrated by C. M. Gere. Third Edition. Peap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.; padded surface, 1s.

Also Translated by C. Dens, D.D. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

See also Montgomery, J. E. G. 4s., Library of Devotion, and Standard Library.

Kenny (James Houghton), D.D. Assistant Lecturer in Divinity in the University of Dublin. See St. Paul.

Kerr (S. Parnell). GEORGE SELWYN AND THE WITS. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Klimmins (C. W.), M.A. THE CHEMISTRY OF LIFE AND HEALTH. Illustrated. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

King (Sir A. W.), See Little Library.

King (Gudger). BARRACK ROOM BALLADS. 1894. Thomas. Twenty-seventh edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Peap. See Leader.

THE SIXTY YEAR. 1894. Thomas. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Peap. 8vo. Leather, 1s.

THE SIXTEEN NATIONS. 1894. Thomas. Sixth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Peap. 8vo. Leather, 1s.

DEPARTMENTAL DUTIES. Eighteenth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Peap. 8vo. Leather, 1s.

Knight (Albert G.). THE COMPLETE CRICKETER. With 50 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Knowling (R. J.), M.A., Professor of New Testament Exegesis at King's College, London. See Westminster Commentary.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S CATALOGUE

Kenn (Whitford P.), THE COURT OF A SAINT. Web of Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Kropotkin (Peter), THE TERROR IN RUSSIA. An Appeal to the Nation. Seventh Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. net.

Lubomirski (Edouard). See Compiled French Texts.

Lamb (Charles and Mary), THE WORKS. Edited by E. V. LUCAS. Illustrated. In Seven Volumes. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. each. See also Little Library and Lucas (E. V.)

Lambert (F. A. H.). See Little Guide.

Lambros (Professor S. P.). See Byzantine Texts.

Lane-Poole (Stanley), A HISTORY OF ISLAM. Translated by W. J. F. and J. R. Green and a Map. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Langbridge (F.), 31. A BALLAD OF THE BRAVE. Poems of Chivalry, Enterprise, Courage, and Adventure. Second 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Lancaster (Sir E. Bayly, K.C.B., F.R.S.), 32. THE PLANETARIUM. With 120 Illustrations, 12 Maps, and a Diagram. Second 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Law (W. Hiram). See Library of Devotional and Spiritual Library.

Lauch (Henry), THE SPIRIT OF THE LITTLE. See also Brand (James).

Le Bras (Anatole), THE LAND OF PARDONS. Translated by FRANCIS M. COSTLING. With 11 Illustrations in Colour by T. C. BOYCE, and 40 other Illustrations. Third 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Lee (Margaret L.). See Browning (Robert).

Lee (Beatrice). See Six Ages of European History.

Lee (Prestwich), A SUMMER IN TOURNAINE. With 20 Illustrations in Colour by MAXWELL ANDREWS, and 16 from Photographs. Also a Map. Second 8vo. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Lehammad (R. C.), M.P. THE COMPLETE GARDEN. With 50 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Levi (V. B.), 33. AIR AND WATER. Illustrated. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Lewis (W. M. Owen), A CONCISE HANDBOOK OF GARDEN SHRUBS. With 20 Illustrations. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Lindsey (Lady Mabel), 34. 35. & 36. MARY. A GOSPEL STUDY. In Two Volumes. Super Royal 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Lindsay (W. M.), Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford. See Plautus.

Lisle (Fortuné), See Little Books on Art.

Littlehales (H.). See Antiquary's Books.

Llewellyn (Owen) and Raven-Hill (L.), THE SOUTH-BOUND CAR. With 32 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Lock (Walter), D.D., Warden of Keble College. ST. PAUL, THE MASTER BUILDER. Second Ed. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

THE BIBLE AND CHRISTIAN LIFE. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

See also Keith (J.) and Letters of Religion.

Letter (P.). See Little Library.

Lacock (Katherine H.). See Browning (R.).

Lodge (Sir Oliver), 37. THE NEW STANCE OF FAITH, ALLIED WITH SCIENCE: A Course for Parents and Teachers. Tenth Ed. Cr. 8vo. 1s. net.

MAN AND THE UNIVERSE: A Study of the Influence of the Advance in Scientific Knowledge upon our Conceptions of Christianity. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

THE SURVIVAL OF MAN: A Study of Life and Death in the World. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Lodge (Oliver C.), See the Ages of European History.

Lofthouse (W. F.), M.A., ETHICS AND ATONEMENT. With a Foreword by Dr. H. H. Price. 1s. 6d.

Loose (Rev. W. W.). See Little Library.

Love (Rev. George Horne), 38. THE LIFE AND DEATH OF MERCHANT TREVOR. In Two Volumes. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

OLD CORSON GRAHAM. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Marlimer (Norwell), BY THE WATERS OF EGYPT. With 26 Illustrations in Colour, a Map, and a Diagram. Second 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Master (James). See P. L.

Matthews (F.), THE LIFE OF CHARLES LAMB. With 16 Illustrations. First and Revised Edition in One Volume. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

A WANDERER IN HOLLAND. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by HERMANN MAESSEN, 16 Illustrations after Old Masters, and a Map. Tenth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

A WANDERER IN LONDON. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by Mr. J. M. DIXON, 16 other Illustrations and a Map. Eighth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

A WANDERER IN PARIS. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by WALTER DURRER, and 12 from Photographs after Old Masters. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE OPEN ROAD: 1 Little Book for the Wayfarer. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

THE FRIENDLY TOWN: a Little Book for the Urban Friend. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

FIRST FOR ALL, LAST FOR NONE. Fifth Edition. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

CHARACTER AND COMEDY. Fifth Edition. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

THE GENTLEST ART. A Choice of Letters by Entertaining Hands. Fifth Edition. Fcap. 8vo. 1s.

A SWAN AND HER FRIENDS. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

MER INFINITE VARIETY: A Feminine Poem of Galatea. Fourth Edition. Fcap. 8vo. 1s.

LISTENER'S LURE: An Odeque Narration. Sixth Edition. Fcap. 8vo. 1s.

GOOD COMPANY. A Novel by Mrs. Gaskell. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

ONE DAY AND ANOTHER! A Volume of Essays. Translated from the German by OVERBECK AND AX. Last German CHRONICLE. Seventh Ed. Proprietary. 3s. 6d.
See also Lamb (Charles).

Lorraine. See Classical Translation.

Lubbock, W. J., M.A. See Commercial Library.

Lyon (Rev'd. S. J.) A PRETTY FRANK GEOMETRY. With numerous Diagrams. Cr. 8vo. 1s.
See also Junior School Books.

Lupton (Hon. Mrs. A.) WOMEN AND THEIR WORK. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Macaulay (Lord). ROSES OF LUCIA & LIDAY. With some of her Letters. Edited by R. M. Prop. Prop. 3s. 6d. net.

Macaulay (Lord). CRITICAL AND HISTORICAL ESSAYS. Ed. ed. 1. C. 3 vols. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

McAllen (J. H. B.), M.A. See Commercial Library.

McCabe (Joseph) (formerly V. J. Rev. F. ASTON). See 1871. In 1871 CHURCH OF KOME. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Macaulay (Thomas) A. L., M.A., STUART. With 44 Illust. including a Frontispiece in Photographs. New and Cheaper Ed. Large Cr. 8vo. 6s.
See also Leaders of Religion.

McDermott (E. R.) See Books on Business.

McDougall (William), M.A. (Oxon., M. E. Cantab.). AN INTRODUCTION TO SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY. Second Ed. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

M'Dowell (A. D.) See Oxford Biographies.

McEwan, Peter C., M.A., M.B. See Macmillan Library of Medicine.

MacKay (A. M.), B.A. See Chapman's Library.

MacKenzie (W.), Leggat, M.A., M.D., D.P.H., etc. THE HEALTH OF THE SCHOOL CHILD. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

MacKinnon (Herbert W.), M.A. See Authors & Editors.

MacNair (A. H.), B.D. See Westminster Commentaries.

"Madame Bovary" (Author of). ST CATHERINE OF SIENA AND HER TIMES. With 16 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Maeterlinck (Maurice), M.A. THE BLUE BIRD: A FAIRY PLAY IN FIVE ACTS. Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXIERA DE MATTO. Ninth Edition. Prop. 1s. Demy 8vo. 3s. 6d. net. Also in Paper Covers. Prop. 1s. 6d. net.

Maguire (Laurie), M.A. A PRIMER OF "ROMAN LAW". Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Malloch (J. P.), LL.D. A HISTORY OF THE TUTELA OF THE PTOLEMIES. With 16 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Maitland (P. W.), M.A., LL.D. ROMAN CANON LAW IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. Prop. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Majer (H.), B.A., B.Sc. A HEALTH AND TEMPERANCE READER. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Madden (H.), B.A., M.A. ENGLISH BY-PLACES: A Companion to the History of England. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

THE RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF A CITIZEN. Seventh Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
See also School Histories.

Merchant (E. C.), M.A. Fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge. A GREEK ANTHOLOGY. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
See also Cook (A. M.).

Marett (R. R.), M.A. Fellow and Tutor of Exeter College, Oxford. THE THREE HOLD OF RELIGION. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

Marks (Giovanni), M.A. ENGLISH FASTOKAL DRAMA from the Restoration to the date of the publication of the "Critical Edition" (1660-1700). Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

Marry (J. H.), F.R.S. Fellow of St John's College, Cambridge. THE SCIENTIFIC SILENT-SPEECH. A. 7th Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

MILITARY GEOLOGY. Illustrated. Cr. 8vo.

Mariotti (Charles). A SPANISH HOLIDAY. With 8 Illustrations by A. M. Poweraker, R. D.A., and 16 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Mariott (J. A. R.), M.A. THE LIFE AND TIMES OF LORD FALKLAND. With 23 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.
See also Six Ages of European History.

Marvell (Andrew). See Little Library.

Marshall (John). SEA LIFE IN NELSON'S TIME. With 16 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

ON THE SPANISH MAIN: or Some Events Prior to the Invasion of DARIEN. With 12 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

A SAILOR'S GARLAND. Selected and Edited by. Second Ed. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

AN ENGLISH PROSE MISCELLANY. Selected and Edited by. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Mackall (A.). See Chapman's Library.

Mason (A. J.), D.D. See Leaders of Religion.

Masterson (C. P. G.), M.A., S.T.P. JESUS CHRIST AS A RELIGIOUS TEACHER. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE CONDITION OF ENGLAND. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Masterson (J. H. B.), M.A. See Six Ages of European History.

Matthews (H. F.). COUNSELLS OF LIFE. Prop. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Meadow (J. H.), M.A. See Handbook of English Church History.

May (Phil). THE PHIL MAY ALBUM. Second Edition. 1s. 6d. to 1s. 10s.

Mayne (Ethel Cultural). ENCHANTERS OF MEN. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

MENDES (Antonio M. B.). Fellow of the Anthropological Institute. WOMAN IN TRANSITION. Cr. 8vo. 4s.

GALICIA. THE SWITZERLAND OF SPAIN. With 25 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo. 12s. net.

McDOWELL (D. J.), M.A. Professor of History in the University of Glasgow. ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS OF ENGLISH CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY, COMPRISING A SELECTED NUMBER OF THE CHIEF CHARTERS AND DOCUMENTS. Cr. 8vo. 10s. net.

Mellown (Eugene S.). A SHORT STORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Cr. 8vo. 3s. net.

Mérimee (P.). See Simplified French Texts.

Metherell (A. H. S.), M.A. THE TRAGEDY OF SOUTH AFRICA. Cr. 8vo. 1s. net. Also Cr. 8vo. 3d. net.

ENGLAND'S RUIN : Discourse in Fourscore Years on a Non-existent Ninth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3d. net.

Mignet (Théodore). COROT AND HIS PAINTINGS. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. net.

Miles (Enoch), M.A. LIFE AFTER LIFE : OR THE THEORY OF REINCARNATION. Cr. 8vo. 1s. net.

THE POWER OF CONCENTRATION : HOW TO ACQUIRE IT. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. net.

Miles (J. G.) THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF SIR JOHN EVERETT MILLAIS, President of the Royal Academy. With many Illustrations, of which a few in Photogravure. New Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. net.

See also Little Gallerie.

Middleton (G. F.). THE PUPIL GARDEN. With 16 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 1s. net.

Mitchell (C. T. W.). See Textbooks of Technology.

Milne (J. G.), M.A. A HISTORY OF EGYPT UNDER ROMAN RULE. With 143 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Milton (John). A DAY BOOK OF MILTON. Edited by R. J. TOWNSEND. Post 8vo. 1s. net. net.

See also Little Library and Standard Library.

Minton & Co. (M. A. See Post 8vo.)

Mitchell (F. Chalmers), M.A. OXFORD LOGIC. With 74 Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 4s.

Mitton (G. E.). JANE AUSTEN AND HER TIMES. With 16 Illustrations. Second and Cheaper Edition. Large Cr. 8vo. 4s.

Mitford (Mary B. L.). QUEEN LOUISA OF PRUSSIA. With 16 Illustrations. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo. 4s.

Moffit (A.). See Books on Business.

Moir (D. M.). See Little Library.

Molson (Dr. Michael de). See Library of Money.

Moneys (L. G. Chaloner), M.P. RICHES AND POVERTY. Sixth Edition. Demy 8vo. 3s. net. Also Cr. 8vo. 1s. net.

Montague (Henry). Earl of Montagu. The Library of Devotion.

Montgomery (A. DAY BOOK OF. Edited by C. J. FOX. Price 1s. 6d. net.

Montgomery (H. B.). THE EMPIRE OF THE EAST. With a Foreword by C. W. and other Editors. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Montgomery (J. E. G. Fox, B.A., LL.B.). THOMAS A KEMPIS, HIS AGE AND BOOK. With 16 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Moor (W. E.). BACK TO THE LAND. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Moor (T. Stoeckel). ART AND LIFE. With 16 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 1s. net.

Moorhouse (F. Hallinan). NELSON'S LADY HAMILTON. With 16 Portraits. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Moran (Clarence G.). See Books on Business.

Morris (Sir Thomas). See Standard Library.

Moskow (W. B.). Uriel College, Oxford. A HISTORY OF RUSSIA FROM PETER THE GREAT TO ALEXANDER II. With 12 Maps and Plans. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Mosch (R. J.). See School Examination Papers.

Mosby (Mortimer W.). Founded on THE RED PEOPLE. With 16 Illustrations. 3s. Crown 8vo. 1s. net.

LITTLE MITCHELL: THE STORY OF A MOUNTAIN SQUIRREL, TOLD BY HIMSELF. With 16 Illustrations. 3s. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Morris (J.). THE MAKERS OF JAPAN. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Morris (Joseph E.). See Little Gallerie.

Morton (A. Anderson). See Books on M.

Mosse (H. G. W.). The Love-Ballad of Dr. Bon. See Leaders of Religion.

Moss (W. M. Patterson), M.A. THE CHELISTRY OF LIFE. Illustrated. Cr. 8vo. 1s. net.

Moundella (V. A.), M.A. See Dens (J. T.).

Mosse (R.), M.A., LL.D. See Antiquary.

Mosset (Alfred de). See Simplified French Text.

Mowat (A. Wallis). THE COMPLETE LAWN TENNIS PLAYER. With 16 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Naval Officer (A). See I. P. L.

Newman (Ernest). See New Library of Music.

Newman (George), M.D. F.R.C.P., F.R.C.S. See New Library of Medicine.

Newman (John), M.A., and others. See Library of Non-fiction.

Newsholme (Arthur), M.D., F.R.C.P. See New Library of Medicine.

Nichols (Brewster). See Little Library.

Nicoll (T.), M.A. EXAMINATION PAPER IN THE CYCLOPS. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Nimrod. See I. P. L.

Nogarin (G. La Grange). THE LIFE OF

ST. WALTER SCOTT. With 20 Illustrations by JERRY WALTER. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
Norway. A. R. & J. C. F. Past and Present. With 25 Coloured Illustrations by J. A. COOK. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Novella. THE DISCIPLES AT SAINTS and other FRAGMENTS. Edited by Miss USA BIRKS. Postg. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.
Officer (An). See L. P. L.
Oxford (W. J.), M.A. Preliminary of Lincoln. A PRIMER OF RELIGION Based on the Lecture on the Condition of England. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.
Oxburgh (P. H.), B.A. See Textbooks of Science.
Oxphant (Wm.). See Leaders of Religion.
Owen (Thomas), M.D. See New Library of Devotion.
Owen (G. W. G.), M.A. Fellow of All Souls' Oxford. A HISTORY OF THE ART OF WAR IN THE MIDDLE AGES. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.
ENGLAND BEFORE THE CONQUEST. D. J. B. 10s. 6d. net.
Oxford & P.L. See University of Oxford.
Oxford (O. L.), D.D. See Textbooks of Theology and Leaders of Religion.
Owen (J. H.), See L. & J. Owen's Book on Owen (Douglas). See Books on Business.
Oxford (M. H.), of Guy's Hospital. A HAND-BOOK OF MEDICAL AND SURGICAL LECTURES. 2 vols. 8vo. 12s. net.
Pikes (W. G. C.), THE SCIENCE OF H. H. V. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 11s.
Parker (Eric). A BOOK OF THE EGYPTIAN GODS. With 20 Illustrations from Photographs by Henry IRVING. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Parker (Gilbert), M.A. A LOVER'S DIARY. Fcap. 8vo. 1s.
Parker (A. K.), SMALL LESSONS ON GREAT TRUTHS. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
Parthenon (John). THE EIGHTH OF PARADISUS TERRESTRIS, OR A CAPTAIN'S JOURNAL OF PLANT SANT FLOWERS. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.
Parsons (Mrs. C.), CARRICK AND HIS CIRCLE. With 36 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.
THE INCOMPARABLE SIDDONS. With 20 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.
Pascal. See Library of Devotion.
Paxton (George). SOCIAL CARICATURE IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. With 36 Illustrations. Imperial Quarto. 4s. 12s. 6d. net.
LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGU AND HER TIMES. With 24 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.
   See also Little Books on Art and L. P. L.
Peterson (K. A.), THE COURT OF L. 13 XIII. With 56 Illustrations. Third Edition. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.
Peterson (K. A.), NATURE IN EAST COAST NATURALIST. Illustrated in Colour by F. SOUTHCATE, R.C.A. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
NATURE IN EASTERN NORFOLK. With 17 Illustrations in Colour by Frank SOUTHGATE, R.C.A. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
WILD LIFE ON A NORFOLK ESTUARY. With 40 Illustrations by the Author, and a Prefatory Note by the Duke of Beaufort. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.
MAY, A. J. NATURE ON TIDAL WATER. With Illustrations by the Author. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Poerch (Albert). See Little Books on Art.
Poerch (A. J.), A GUIDE TO CARELESS ANNUAL AND BIENNIAL PLANTS. With 24 Illustrations. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.
Pool (Robert), and Minchin (H. G.), M.A. CIVILIZATIONAL DECORATIONS in Colour. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Post (Sidney), late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, before 1860. A READING LESSON IN THE LICENSING LAWS. PRACTICAL LICENSING REFORM. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Poulett (Charles), B.A. See Library of Devotion.
Potter (W. G. M.), Professor D.C.L. 1892. Professor of Egyptology in University College. A HISTORY OF EGYPT. Fully illustrated. In six volumes. Cr. 8vo. 6s. each.
 VOL. I. FROM THE EARLIEST KING TO XVIIth Dynasty. Sixth Edition.
 VOL. II. THE XVIIIth and XIXth Dynasties. Fourth Edition.
 VOL. III. XIXth to XXXth Dynasties.
 VOL. IV. Roman Period. The Ptolemaic Period. By J. P. MAIER, Late D.
 VOL. V. EGYPT UNDER ROMAN RULE. J. O. MAIER, M.A.
 VOL. VI. EGYPT IN THE MIDDLE Ages. By J. O. MAIER, M.A.
RELIGION AND CONSCIENCE IN ANCIENT EGYPT. Lectures delivered in University College, London. Illustrated. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
SYRIA AND EGYPT, FROM THE TELL ELAMARNA LETTERS. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
EGYPTIAN TALES. Translated from the Papyri. First Series, ninth to ninth Dynasty. Edited by W. B. F. GOODFELLOW, illustrated by THOMAS BELL. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
EGYPTIAN TALES. Translated from the Papyri. Second Series, tenth to ninth Dynasty. Illustrated by THOMAS BELL. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.
EGYPTIAN DECORATIVE ART. A Course of Lectures delivered at the Royal Holloway College. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
Philpot (W. A.), See Little Books on Art.
Philpot (W. A.), MY AEGYPTIAN STAR. With 36 Illustrations by J. LEWIS PETTERSON. Second and Cheaper Edition. Fcap. 8vo. 6s.
UP-ALONG AND DOWN-ALONG. Illustrated by CLARENCE SHREVE. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Physick (J. Ernest). TREES IN NATURE, MYTH, AND ART. With 24 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 6s.

Phiz (Victor G.), M.A. See School Library.

Plate. See Standard Library.

Plautus. THE CAPTIVE. Edited, with an Introduction, Textual Notes, and a Commentary, by W. H. LINDSAY, Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford. Demy 8vo. 1s. net.

Playford-Wardlaw (J. T.), B.A. See School Examination Series.

Polymer (Frederick). MODERN SPHERICAL ASTRONOMY. See Astronomy. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

MESMERISM AND CHRISTIAN SCIENCE: A Short History of Mental Healing. Second Ed. Demy 8vo. 1s. net.

Pollard (Alice). See Little Books on Art.

Pollard (Alfred W.). THE SHAKESPEARE POLICE AND CLARISSA. With a Foreword by John Cowper Powys.

Pollard (Eliza F.). See Little Books on Art.

Ponsonby (Dame M.), M.A. See Books on Travel.

Potter (M. C.), M.A., F.L.S. AN ELEMENTARY TEXT-BOOK OF AGRICULTURAL BOTANY. Illustrated. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Powell & T. T. THE TENANT FARMER ENGINEER.

Power (J. O'Connor). THE MAKING OF AN ORATOR. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Price (Eleanor C.). A PRINCESS OF THE OLD WORLD. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Price (L. L.), M.A., Fellow of Oriel College, Oxon. A HISTORY OF ENGLISH POLITICAL ECONOMY FROM ADAM SMITH TO ARNOLD TOYNBEE. Sixth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Protheroe (Ernest). THE DOMINION OF MAN: GEOGRAPHY IN ITS HUMAN ASPECT. With 36 Full-page Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Paulus. See Breviary Texts.

Pullen (Henry H.B.). IN A GERMAN LAND. An Account of Four Weeks in New Britain. With 8 Illustrations and a Map. Cr. 8vo. 1s. net.

Pycraft (W. P.). BIRD LIFE. With 2 Illustrations in Colour by G. E. Lodge, and many from Drawings and Photographs. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Qu' & T. Quiller-Couch. THE GOLDEN POMP. A PROCESSION OF ENGLISH LYRICS FROM SWEENEY TO SHIRLEY. Second and Cheaper Ed. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Q. R. and H. S. MR. WOODHOUSE'S CORRIE JOURNAL. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Also published in a Colonial Edition.

Ruckham (R. D.), M.A. See Westminster.

Rugg (Laura M.). THE WOMEN ARTISTS OF BOLOGNA. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

Rush (Fleming), B.D., Owen. DAVID AND HIS ITALY. With 30 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Russell (P. A.), M.A., B.Sc. HIGHER ENGLISH. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

JUNIOR ENGLISH. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Rutherford (B. W.), D.D. See Library of Devotion.

Russell (D. W.), M.A. A STUDENT'S HISTORY OF SCOTLAND. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

WORDSWORTH AND HIS CIRCLE. With 20 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Rushdie (Sheetal), M.A., Fellow and Tutor of New College, Oxford. DOCTRINE AND DEVELOPMENT. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Rutherford (John), M.A. See Associate's Books.

Rutter (H. G.). See Associate's Books.

Rutledge (Bertrand). CLIFF AND CLOUD. With 16 Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Rutherford (Lawrence, Esq.). See I.P.L. Government Writers. See School Histories. See also 1815, 1840, 1870, 1873.

OF MARIE MADELEINE & COUNTESS OF LA FAYETTE. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Ryan (Harold). THE LITTLE FADS AND FEEDING. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Rud Paddy (A). See I.P.L.

Russon (W.), M.A. UNIVERSITY AND SOCIAL SETTLEMENTS. Edited by Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Rutherford (H. A.), M.A., D.Litt. See Westminster Commemoration.

Russ (J. D.), C.I.E., M.P. THE REAL INDIA. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Rush (Emily), Dame Julia. WOMAN THROUGH THE AGES. With 36 Illustrations. Two Volumes. Demy 8vo. 2s. net.

Rutherford (Sir Jacob). See Time Galleries. See also 1815, 1840, 1870.

Ricketts (Charles). See Classics of Art.

Richardson (Charles). THE COMPLETE FOXHUNTER. With 40 Illustrations, of which 4 are in Colour. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Rutherford (William), Chaplain of Lincoln's Inn. THE CRED IN THE EPISTLES. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Rutter (W. H.). See Song and Drama Texts.

Rutherford (W. R.). See Charles C. C.

Rutherford (A. D.). See also Author of Books. THE JEWISH AGE. (The Jewish Age of Moses.) See also Author of Books. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Rutherford (L. G.). Grant, M.A., Fellow of All Souls, Oxford. See also Author of Books. SELECT STATUTES, CASES, AND CONSTITUTIONAL DOCUMENTS. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Robertson (G. Grant) and Bartholomew (J. G.), F.R.S.E., F.R.C.S. A HISTORICAL AND MODERN ATLAS OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE. Demy Quarto. 4s. 6d. net.

Robertson (Sir G. S.), K.C.S.I. CHITRAL: THE STORY OF A MUNIC SIEGE. With 8 Illustrations. Third Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Robinson (Cecil), THE MINISTRY OF EDUCATION. With an Introduction by the late Archibald of Cawdor. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Robinson (F. S.). See Connoisseur's Library.

Rochefoucauld (Laf.). See Little Library.

Rodwell (G. J.). A NEW TESTAMENT GREEK. A Course for Beginners. With a Preface by WALTER LOCK, D.D., Warden of Keble College. Post 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Ros (Prest). STOAKFURNITURE with many Illustrations by the Author, including a short history and two "Second Editions." Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Rogers (A. G. L.), M.A. See Books on Business.

Roland. See Simplified French Texts.

Romney (George). See Little Galleries.

Roscoe (E. S.). See see also des.

Rose (Edward). THE NINE READER. Illustrated. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. Also in 4 Parts. Parts I. and II. 6d. each; Part III. 1s.; Part IV. 1s.

Rose (G. H.). See Hey (H.) and Hastings-Gould (S.).

Roxwroth (Joshua). THE IMPERIAL DUCHESS TRAIL. A Story written for the Young Generation. Third edition. Revised. Cr. 8vo. 1s. net.

Roxas-Smith (W. G.). THE PILLOW BOOK. A GARNER OF MANY NOODS. Collected by. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

POETS OF OUR DAY. Selected, with an Introduction, by. Post 8vo. 1s.

Rubb (A. E.), D.D. See Junior School Books.

Rutherford (The Right Hon. Sir Harcourt, Bart., G.C.B., G.C.M.G., K.T.). THE AUSTRIAN COURT IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. With 16 Illustrations. Second Ed. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Russell (Archibald G. B.). See Dicks (William).

Russell (W. Clark). THE LIFE OF ADMIRAL LORD COLLINGWOOD. With 12 Illustrations by F. BRAUNWEIL. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Ryley (M. Beresford). QUEENS OF THE RENAISSANCE. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Sabinbury (Harrington), M.D., F.R.C.P. PRINCIPIA THERAPEUTICA. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

See also New Library of Medicine.

St. Amant. See Library of Devotion.

St. Augustine. See Library of Devotion.

St. Bernard. See Library of Devotion.

St. Cyrus (Visscher). See Oxford Bibliob.

St. Francis of Assisi. THE LITTLE FLOWERS OF THE GLORIOUS MESSENGER, AND OF HIS FRIARS. Done into English, with Notes by WALTER HARWOOD. With 16 Illustrations from Italian Painters. Demy 8vo. 1s. net.

See also Library of Devotion and Standard Library.

St. Francis de Sales. See Library of Devotion.

St. James. See Churchman's Bible and Westminster Common area.

St. Luke. See Junior School Books.

St. Mark. See Junior School Books and Churchman's Bible.

St. Matthew. See Junior School Books.

St. Paul. SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS. Edited by JOHN HUNTERSON KIRKBY, D.D., Associate Lecturer in Divinity in the University of Edinburgh. With Introductions, Annotations, and Notes by J. SCHUYLER CO. Post 8vo. See also Churchman's Bible and Westminster Common area.

"Sark" (Mr. Munro). REGINALD. Second Edition. Crap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Saxton (A. L.). See Little Guides.

Sawdon (Lloyd). THE HOLLAND HANDBKCK. With 16 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Sethos (R.). See Egyptian Texts.

Shestoff (John). See Byzantine Texts.

Schobold (A. T. M. D.). His Poor Friend, the Hospital. See New Library of Medicine.

Scudamore (Cyril). See Little Guides.

Scupell (Dame L.). See Library of Devotion.

Séraph (Mathilde de). See Simplified French Texts.

Sedgwick (R. de). See Kepp (John).

Sedgwick (Hugh de). OKLAHOMA. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Sellie (V. P.), M.A. THE MECHANICS OF DAILY LIFE. Illustrated. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Selwyn (Edmund). TOMMY SMITH'S ANIMALS. Illustrated by O. W. ONS. Eleventh Edition. Crap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. School Edition. 1s. 6d.

TOMMY SMITH'S OTHER ANIMALS. Illustrated by AUGUSTA GUEST. Fifth Edition. Crap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

School Edition. 1s. 6d.

Senter (George). B.Sc. (Lond.), Ph.D. See Textbooks of Science.

Shakespeare (William). THE FOUR YOLIOS. 1603, 1609, 1613, 1623. Each £s. 6d. net, or a complete set, £10. net. net.

THREE PINTS OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE. With an Introduction and Notes.

By George Whigham. Story for Boys. Cloth each 2s. 6d., nov. 6d.
See also Actor Shakespeare, Standard
Library and Little Quarto Shakespeare.

Bilger (A.). VICTORIAN POETS. Cr.
1s. 6d.

Sharp (Cecil). See Beding Gould (S.).

Sharp (Elizabeth). See Little Books on Art.

Beddoe (J. S.). THE PIANOFORCE.
3s. NATA. Cr. 1s. 9d.

Shelley (Percy B.). See Standard Library.

Sheppard (H. F.). M.A. See *Beding
Gould* (S.).

Sherwell (Arthur). LIFE IN WEST
LONDON. Third Edition. Cr. 1s.
1s. 6d.

Shipley (Mary E.). AN ENGLISH
CATHOLIC HISTORY FOR CHILD
REN. With a Preface by the Bishop of Gibraltar. With Maps and Illustrations.
Cr. 1s. Each part 1s. 6d. net.

PART I.—To the Norman Conquest.
PART II.—To the Reformation.

Sichel (Walter). See Oxford Biographies.

Sidgwick, Mrs. Alfred H. The Life of Elkann. With 10 Illustrations.
Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Sime (John). See Little Books on Art.

Sommers (G. A.). FRANCESCO GUARDI. With 41 Plates. Imperial 4to. £2. 2s. net.

Sketchley (R. E. D.). See Little Books on Art.

Sidney (H. P. H.). See Little Books on Art.

Sladen (Douglas). SICILY: The New Winter Resort. With over 100 Illustrations.
Second Ed. 1s. Cr. 1s. 9d. net.

Smartwood (M. G.). See Little Books on Art.

Speedy (P. E. L.) See IPL.

Smith (Adam). THE WEALTH OF NATION. Edited with an Introduction and numerous Notes by Roderick CARMAN,
M.A. Two vols. Demy 8vo. 2s. net.

Smith (H. Bonham). M.A. A NEW JUNIOR ARITHMETIC. Comes free
Without Answers, 1s. With Answers, 1s. 6d.

Smith (H. Clifford). See Conquerors.
1s. 6d.

Smith (Horace and James). See Little Library.

Smith (R. Middle). *THOUGHTS FOR
THE DAY.* Edited by. Demy 8vo.
1s. 6d. net.

Smith (Newell C.). See Wordsworth (W).

Smith (John Thomas). A BOOK FOR A RAINY DAY; Or, Recollections of the Events of the Year 1860-1873. Edited by William WHITTEM. Illustrated. Hard
Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Scott (F. J.). A BOOK OF EXMOOR.
Illustrated. Cr. 1s. 6d.

Snowden (C. E.). A HANDY DIGEST OF BRITISH HISTORY. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Sophocles. See Classical Translations.

Sornet (L. A.), and Acosta (M. J.). See
"Junior School Books."

Somethy (E.). ENGLISH SEAMEN.
Edited by David HARVEY.
Vol. I. (Howard, Clifford, Hawkins, Drake, Cowdray). Second Edition. Cr.
1s. 6d.

Vol. II. (Richard Hawkins, Grenville, Eaton, and Raleigh). Cr. 1s. 6d.

See also Standard Library.

Souvestre (E.). See Simplified French Texts.

Sopace (C. M.). M.A. See School Instruments. 1s. 6d.

Spicer (A. Drynan), M.A. THE PAPER TRADE. A Descriptive and Historical Survey. With Diagrams and Plans. Demy
8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

Speaker (W. A.), M.A. See Lectures on Religion.

Sprague (W. Norton), M.A. See Junior School Books.

Stanley (Edgcumbe). THE GUILDS OF FLORANCE Illustrated. Second Edition.
Royal 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Stanbridge (J. W.), B.D. See Library of Devotion.

Stancliffe. GOLDO'S AND DONTE'S.
Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s.

Stand (D. W.). See Gillaber (D.).

Stedman (A. M. M.), M.A.

INITIAL LATINA: Easy Lessons on Elementary Accidence. Seventh Edition. Demy
8vo. 1s.

FIRST LATIN LESSONS. Eighth Edition.
Cr. 1s. 6d.

FIRST LATIN READER. With Notes adapted to the Shorter Latin Primer and Vocabulary. Seventh Edition. Demy
8vo. 1s. 6d.

EASY SELECTIONS FROM CESAR.
The Helvetian War. Fourth Edition.
Demy 8vo. 1s.

EASY SELECTIONS FROM LIVY. The Kings of Rome. Second Edition. Demy
8vo. 1s. 6d.

EASY LATIN PASSAGES FOR UNSEEN
TRANSLATION. Thirteenth Ed. Demy
8vo. 1s. 6d.

EXEMPLIA LATINA. First Lessons in Latin Accidence. With Vocabulary.
Fourth Edition. Cr. 1s. 6d.

EASY LATIN EXERCISES ON THE SYNTAX OF THE SHORTER AND REVISED LATIN PRIMER. With Vocabulary. Thirteenth Ed. Cr. 1s.
1s. 6d. Key, 1s. net.

THE LATIN COMPOUND SENTENCE: Rules and Exercises. Second Edition.
Cr. 1s. 6d. With Vocabulary, 1s.

MOTANDA QUARDAM: Miscellaneous Latin Exercises on Common Rules and Idioms. Fifth Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.
With Vocabulary, 1s. Key, 1s. net.

LATIN VOCABULARIES FOR REPE-TITION: Arranged according to Subjects. Sixteenth Edition. Demy 8vo.
1s. 6d.

A VOCABULARY OF LATIN IDIOMS.
Demy. Fourth Edition. 1s.

GENERAL LITERATURE

STEPS TO GREEK. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.
A 1000-YEAR GREEK PRIMER. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.
EASY GREEK PASSAGES FOR EASY TRANSLATION. Fourth Edition; re-edited. Pract. for Pupils.
GREEK VOCABULARIES FOR BY-PETITION. Arranged according to Subjects. Fourth Edition. Pract. for Pupils. 1s. 6d.
GREEK TESTAMENT SELECTIONS. For the use of Schools. With Introduction, Notes, and Vocabulary. Fourth Edition. Pract. for Pupils. 1s. 6d.

STEPS TO FRENCH. Fourth Edition, 1s. 6d.

EASY FRENCH PASSAGES. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.
EASY FRENCH PASSAGES FOR EASY TRANSLATION. Sixth Edition. Pract. for Pupils. 1s. 6d.
EASY FRENCH EXERCISES ON ELEMENTARY SYNTAX. With Vocabulary. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
 See also School Examination Series.

French & "Carr" GRAMMARS FOR BY-PETITION: Arranged according to Subjects. Fourteenth Edition. Pract. for Pupils. 1s.
 See also School Examination Series.

Steel (R., Eliza), M.A., F.C.S. THE WORLD OF SCIENCE. With 147 Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
 See also School Examination Series.

Gillanders (John) of the Royal Naval College, Greenwich, and Bodiam (G. H.) of the Royal Naval College, Greenwich. A TUTORIAL BOOK DEALING WITH ORNAMENTAL DESIGN FOR WOVEN FABRICS. With 64 full-page Plates and numerous Diagrams in the Text. Third Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Stevens (Laverton). See Little Library.

Stewart (Katherine). BY ALICE RICHARD KINN WAY AND HER FRIENDS. A Sequel to "By Alice Way." Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Stevenson (R. L.) THE LETTERS OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON TO HIS FAMILY AND FRIENDS. Selected and Edited by HENRY COLVIN. Eighth Edition. 2 vols. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
VAILIMA LETTERS. With an Account Prepared by MAXIM COOPER. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
THE LIFE OF R. L. STEVENSON. See Balfour (G.).

Balfour (M. S.). FROM SARANAC TO THE MARQUESAS. Being Letters written by Mrs. M. S. Stevenson during 1887-88. Cr. 8vo. 6s. net.

LETTERS FROM IAMI. A. J. Balfour. Edited and arranged by M. C. BALFOUR. With many Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Stoddart (Anne Hill). See Oxford Bibliographies.

Stokes (F. W.), D.M. HOUSES WITH

RABELAIS. From the translation of Sir T. Urquhart and P. A. Mottram. With a Portrait in Photogravure. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Stokes (B. J.) POEMS AND HYMNS. With a Memoir by F. G. Ellerton, M.A. With Portrait. Cr. 8vo. 1s.
Stow (Thomas) F. C. M.A. AN ASPECT OF ENGLISH PRACTICAL AND LITERARY HISTORY. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Stoye (Alfred T.). A MEXICAN SHRINE IN ENGLAND. With 4 Illustrations in Colour, and 16 other Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 1s.

See also Little Guides.

Straker (H.). See Books on Building.

Streeter (A. W.), D.D. See Chapman's Bibles.

Streatfield (H. A.) MODERN MUSIC AND MUSICIANS. With 40 Illustrations. Second Ed. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

See also New Library of Music.

Stroud (Henry), D.Sc., M.A. ELEMENTARY PRACTICAL PHYSICS. With 115 Diagrams. Second Ed. Second Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Sturz (P.), Staff Instructor to the County Council. MANUAL TRAINING DRAWING (WOODWORK). With Solutions to Examination Questions. Orthographic, Isometric and Oblique Projection. With 100 Plates and 100 Figures. Second Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Sutherland (F. J.). See Carpets (C. J.).

Sutherland (F. S.). See F. J.

Sutherland (William). OLD AGE PENSIONS AND THE STATE FRALISTERS. With a Foreword by Ernest Bevin. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Sweeney (R. W.). Member of the British Museum Staff. FUNGI AND HOW TO KNOW THEM. With 16 Coloured Plates by M. K. Spittal, and 30 Monochrome Plates. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Symonds (J. E.), M.A. THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Symonds (J. E.), M.A., B.L.B. See A. L. Symonds.

Taylor (Margaret H.). THE SAINTS IN ART. With 10 Illustrations. Pract. for Pupils. 1s. 6d. net.

Todhunter (Agricola). Edited by R. V. Davis, M.A. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

GERMANY. By the same Author. Cr. 8vo. 1s.
 See also Classical Translations.

Tollock (W.). HOWARD LETTERS AND MEMORIES. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Torham (Frederick). See F. see W. W. W.

Trotter (A.). See Library of Devotion.

Trotter (A. E.). THE ELEMENTS OF METAPHYSICS. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Taylor (F. G.), M.A. See Commercial Series.

Taylor (F. G.), M.A. See Commercial Series.

Taylor (John W.). THE SAINTS. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Taylor (T. H.), M.A., Fellow of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. A CONSTITUTIONAL AND POLITICAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND. Two Vols. In Two Parts. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. net.

Tennyson-Barry (G. T.). THE COMPLETE SHOT. With 15 Illustrations. Third Edition. Demy 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

Tennyson (Alfred, Lord). EARLY POEMS. Edited, with Notes and an Introduction, by J. CROWTHER COLLINS, M.A. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

IN MEMORIAM, MAUD, AND THE PRINCESS. Edited by J. CROWTHER COLLINS, M.A. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Tennyson & Co. See Classical Authors.

Tennyson, P. & L. B.A. ELEMENTARY LAT. & GRAMMAR. See Elementary Teacher's Handbook to Elementary Latin.

TEACHER'S HANDBOOK TO ELEMENTARY LATIN. Containing the necessary supplementary material to Pupil's edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

Theodore W. St. See Little Guides.

Theobald F. & G. L. A. IN THE LIFE OF CHRIST. Second Edition. Large Folio. Illustrated. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 12s.

Thibaudet (A. C.). NAPOLÉON AND THE CONSULATE. Translated and Edited by G. K. PORTERAGE, LL.D. With 15 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

Thompson (A. H.). See Little Guides.

Thompson (Francis). ELECTED POEMS OF FRANCIS THOMPSON. With a Biographical Note by WILFRID MEEHILL. With a Portrait in Photogravure. Second Ed. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Thompson (A. P.). See Textbooks of Technology.

Thompson (J. M.), Fellow and Dean of Divinity of Magdalen College, Oxford. JESUS ACCORDING TO ST. MARK. Cr. 8vo. 3s. net.

Thaxter (Macy W.). DAILY STRENGTH FOR DAILY NEEDS. Sixth Edition. Medium 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. Also an edition in superior binding. 6s.

Thompson (W. W.), F.R.H.S. See Little Books on Great Authors.

Toynbee (Paget), M.A., D.Lit. IN THE FOOTPRINTS OF DANTE. A Treasury of Verse and Prose from the works of Dante. Small Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

DANTE IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY. FROM CHAUCER TO CARL. Two vols. Demy 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

See also Oxford Biographies and Dances.

Tozer (G. E.). THE WAY OF LIFE. II. THEY. With 25 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Travers (Eleanor H.). See Romantic Hist.

French (Herbert). DEEDS OF WISDOM. Second and Revised Edition. Large Post 8vo. 6s.

NEW POEMS. Second Edition. Large Post 8vo. 6s.

APOLLO AND THE SEAMAN. Large Post 8vo. 1s. 6d. net; cloth, 1s. 6d. net.

Travers (G. H.). FOLK OF TINTERN COTTAGE. Complete. Large and Uniform 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

THE STORY OF ENGLAND FIFTY YEARS AGO: Being the first two chapters of England under the Stuarts. Edited by G. H. TRAVERS. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Trotter, W. English A LITTLE TOWN OF ANNIENGE: PART, PRESENT, AND FUTURE. With 173 Illustrations. White Royal 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Trotterbook (D. R.). See Little Guides.

Tyler (E. A.), B.A., F.C.I. See Junior School Books.

Tyrrell-Ogil (Frances). See Little Books on Art.

Uawlin (Georgie). See Antiquity Books.

Vardon (Fergus). THE COMPILER OF THE VERSO. With 15 Illustrations. Small 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Vasquez (New York). See Latin Library.

Vasquez (Portuguese). THE HISTORY OF PORTUGAL AT AGE SIXTY. A BABY CALIFORNIA. DUKE OF YORK. With 15 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

THE MARCH POPES (LEO X AND CLEMENT VII). With 15 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

THE NAPLES RIVIERA. With 15 Illustrations to Colour by Gustave GROSSENGAHL. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Vernon (Mrs. W. Mervyn) & A. HEADLEY. A VISION OF DANTE. With an Introduction by Sir R. Deacon. In Two Volumes. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

BEATRICE IN THE PARADISO OF DANTE. With an Introduction by the Rev. DEAN CHURCH. In Two Volumes. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

READINGS ON THE PARADISO OF DANTE. With an Introduction by the Rev. DEAN CHURCH. In Two Volumes. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Vincent (J. E.). THROUGH EAST ANGLIA IN A MOTOR CAR. With 15 Illustrations and Maps by Frank STRANGE, R.E.A. and a Map. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Vogelius (A. A. M.). See Junior Education Series.

Windell (Col. L. A.), LL.D., C.B. INDIA AND ITS MYSTERIES. With a Record of the Exploration of GYPSY. With 15 Illustrations and Maps. Third and Cheaper Edition. Medium 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Wode (G. W.), D.D. OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY. With Maps. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Wode (G. W.), D.D., and Wells (A. H.), M.A. See Little Guides.

Wagner (Richard). RICHARD WAGNER'S MUSIC DRAMAS: Interpretation, embodying Wagner's own explanation. By ALEX. LAWRENCE CLARKE and DAVID COOPER. In Four Volumes. Post 8vo. 1s. 6d. each.

Vol. I.—The Book of the Months.
Third Edition.

Vol. II.—*PARNEL, Langdon, and
The Holy Grail.*

Vol. III.—TRISTAN AND ISOLDE.

Watkinson, Freda. *A JEWISH TOUR
IN FINLAND.* With 16 Illustrations in Colour by ALICEADEN FERRELL, and other Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo.
pp. 64. 6d. net.

Wattley (A. D.). DRAMA AND LIFE.
Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Watt (C.). See Architect's Books.

Watson (F. G.). General Survey of British Archaeology. REVISION NOTES
ON ENGLISH HISTORY. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Watson (H. B.). See Little Books on Art and Art.

Watson (F. W.), M.A. See School Histories.

Watson (Janet) and Cotton (Charlotte).
See J.P.L. and Little Library.

Waterhouse (Elizabeth). WITH THE SIMPLE-HEARTED: Little Homilies for Women in Country Places. Second Edition.
Large 8vo. pp. 128. 6s.

COMPANIONS OF THE WAY. Being Extracts from the Writing and Teaching Recreations. Chosen and arranged by ELIZABETH
WATERHOUSE. Large 8vo. pp. 128.

THOUGHTS OF A TERTIARY. Part
One. 1s. 6d.

See also Little Library.

Watt (France). See Architects (T. F.).

Wetherhead (J. C.). *A CRITICAL
INTRODUCTION PAPERS IN HORACE.* Cr. 8vo. 1s.
See also Junior Examination Series.

Webb (George W.). B.A. A SYSTEM-ATIC GEOGRAPHY OF THE BRITISH ISLES. With Maps and Diagrams. Cr.
8vo. 1s.

Webster (P. C.). See Textbooks of Technical Subjects.

Webster (Arthur G. P.). *A GUIDE TO THE ANTIQUITIES OF UPPER
EGYPT:* From Abydos to the Sudan
Frontier. With 67 Maps, and Plans.
Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

West (Archibald), H. A. An INTRO-DUCTION TO THE HISTORY OF MODERN EUROPE. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

Welch (Catharine). *THE LITTLE
DAUPHIN.* With 16 Illustrations. Cr.
8vo. 1s.

Welch (Henry H.) See Textbooks of Science.

Wells (J. L.). *Archaeology at Victoria
College.* OXFORD AND OXFORD
L.I.L. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Wells (J. L.). Archaeology of EGYPT. A new Edition. With 3 Maps. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
See also Little Guides.

Wester (John). See Architect's Drawings.

Westcott (W. Percival). THE YOUNG NATURALIST. A GUIDE TO BRITISH
ANIMAL LIFE. With 8 Coloured Plates by
C. F. NEWELL, and 100 specially selected Photographs from the collections of well known amateur photographers. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Westcott (W. Percival). F.L.S., M.R.O.U., and Cooper (C. S.). F.R.H.S. THE YOUNG BOTANIST. With 8 Coloured and 63 Black and White Plates drawn from Nature, by C. F. NEWELL. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
net.

Whidbey (C.). See Hawley (W. H.).

Whistler (L.). THE HOUSE OF BENTLEY
(1871). LAURENCE OLIVIER
(1872). CHARACTER. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

White (Lionel E.). THE COMPLETE MANUAL OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.
Large 8vo. pp. 128. 6s.

White (George E.). Lect. Cr. A CENT-RAL POINT IN AFRICA AND PORTUGAL.
Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

White (Gilbert). See Standard Library.

Whitfield (R. H.), M.A. See Commercial Series.

Whitelock (A. W.). *GASPARD DE
COLEGE.* N.Y. ADMIRAL OF FRANCE.
With 16 Illustrations and 10 Maps and Plans. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Whitney (W.). Lect. Cr. 1s. Principal of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. A HANDBOOK OF BOOK OF INORGANIC CHEMISTRY.
Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Whitney (Miss). See Dilke (Lady).

Whitting (Mrs. L.). Lect. Staff Teacher of the National Training School of Cookery.
THE COOK & CULINARY. With 48
Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Whitton (W.). See Little Books on Art.

Whitton & Co. See Little Books on Art.

Whitworth (William). See Little Books on Art.

Whit (Oscar). DE PROFUNDIS.
Twelfth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. net.

THE WORKS OF OSCAR WILDE. In two Volumes. Prop. 8vo. Cr. 1s. 6d. Double edge. 1s. net each volume.

L. LORD ARTHUR SAVILE'S CASE; and the PORTRAIT of MR. W. M. in THE DUCHESS OF PAPERS. 1s. Poems (including 'The Sphinx,' 'The Ballad of Reading Gaol,' and 'Uncollected Poems') 1s. Lady
WILDE'S MAMMA; A WOMAN OF NO IMPORTANCE; A WOMAN'S REVENGE;
THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARL; and
A HOUSE OF POMEGRANATES. 1s.
INTENTIONAL. 1. DE PROFUNDIS and POEM LETTERS. 1s. SAVILE. A surreal
Comedy. Big. 1s. POMPEII. London
Museum. Pompeii. 1s. 6d. SAVILE. A FIDELITY TRAGEDY. LA SAINTE CONSTITUTION.

Wilkins (W. H.), B.A. *THE ALIEN
INVASION.* Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Williams (H. Peel). *THE WOMEN
BONAPARTES.* The Mother and three Sisters of Napoleon. With 36 Illustrations.
In Two Volumes. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

A ROSE OF SAVOY: MARIE ADÉLIEDE OF Savoie; Countess of Savoy; and Her son
Louis XV. With a Foreword on Photogravure and 16 other Illustrations.
Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S CATALOGUE

See also Industrial Condition of the Poor.
Seventh Edition., Cr. 8vo., pp. 6d.
THE PROBLEM OF THE UNEMPLOYED. Fourth Edition., Cr. 8vo., 2s. 6d.
 Hudspeth (E. A. Brayley). THE COURT OF PARIS IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. With 26 Illustrations. Two Volumes. Demy 8vo., pp. 6d. net.
 Huglin (T.), D.C.L. See Leader of Religion.
 Hudson (Mrs. W.) HOW TO IDENTIFY OLD CHINESE PORCELAIN. With 26 Illustrations. Second Edition. Pictorial. 6s.
 Holden-Stone (G. de). See Books on Economics.
 Holdich (Sir T. H.), K.C.I.E., C.B., F.R.A. THE INDIAN BORDERLAND. Illustrated. With 26 Illustrations and a Map. Second Edition. Demy 8vo., 1s. 6d. net.
 Hoderick (W. S.), D.C.L. A HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW. In Four Volumes. Vols. I., II., III. Demy 8vo. Each 1s. 6d. net.
 Holland (Colver). TYROL AND ITS PEOPLE. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by ADRIAN STOKES, 32 other Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo., 1s. 6d. net.
 Holland (H. Scott), Canon of St. Paul's. See Newman (J. H.).
 Hollings (M. A.), M.A. See Six Ages of English History.
 Holloway-Calthrop (W. G.), Vice of Balliol College, Oxford; Bursar of Exeter College. PETRARCH: HIS LIFE, WORK, AND TIMES. With 24 Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 2s. 6d. net.
 Holmes (T. Scott). See Ancient Coins.
 Hoyngate (G. J.). THE CO-OPERATIVE MOVEMENT OF TO-DAY. Fourth Ed. Cr. 8vo., 1s. 6d.
 Hosse (Nathaniel J.). See Antiquary's Books.
 Host & MILITANTY AND ITS PROBLEMS. 1s. 6d. net.
 Hopper, see L. H. Hopper.
 Horace. See Latin Literature.
 Horburgh (E. L. S.) M.A. LORENZO THE MAGNIFICENT: AND FLORENCE IN HER GOLDEN AGE. With 24 Illustrations and 2 Maps. Second Edition. Demy 8vo., 1s. 6d. net.
WATERLOO. With Plans. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo., 1s.
 See also Oxford Biographies.
 Hatch & C. Co. THE LIBRARIES OF TACKABER.
 Norton (R. F.), D.D. See Leaders of Religion.
 Hsieh (Alexander). MANCHESTER. With 26 Illustrations and a Map. Second Edition. Demy 8vo., 9s. 6d. net.
HOW TO BE A GREAT SCHOOLMASTER. With 11 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo., 7s. 6d.
 Howell (A. G. Ferrars). FRANCISCAN DAYS. Being Selections for every day in the year from ancient Franciscan writings. Cr. 8vo., 1s. 6d. net.
 Howell (G.). TRADE UNIONISM—New and Old. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo., 1s. 6d.
 Hopkins (Sir William), K.C.B., O.M., D.L., F.R.S. THE ROYAL MAIL. 71 on. Describes all the Services in the Sciences. Web of Illustrations. With Royal Coat of Arms. 1s. 6d. net.
 Hughes (G. E.). THE PRAISE OF STAKE-PAGE. An Egg as Autobiography. With a Preface by MORRIS LIND. Demy 8vo., pp. 6d. net.
 Hugo (Victor). See Simplified French Texts.
 Hussey (Samuel P.). THE CLERK OF OXFORD IN FICTION. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 1s. 6d. net.
 Hussey (Martindale, M.A.). See Economic History.
 Hutchinson (Horace G.). THE NEW FOREST. Illustrated in colour with 10 Pictures by WALTER LEWIS and 6 by Lucy KEENE-WILSON. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo., 6s.
 Hutton (A. W.), M.A. See Leader of Religion and Library of Devotion.
 Hutton (Edward). THE CITIES OF UMBRIA. With 26 Illustrations in Colour by A. Pisa, and 26 other Illustrations. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo., 6s.
THE CITIES OF SPAIN. With 34 Illustrations in Colour, by A. W. RUMMINGTON, 26 other Illustrations and a Map. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo., 6s.
FLORENCE AND THE CITIES OF NORTHERN TUSCANY, WITH GENOA. With 26 Illustrations in Colour by WILLIAM PARKERSON, and 16 other Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo., 6s.
ENG. ITAL. AND FLORENTIA. 24 and with an Introduction. Pictorial. 1s. 6d. net.
COUNTRY WALKS ABOUT FLORENCE. With 26 Drawings by ADOLFO MARCI and 26 other Illustrations. Pictorial. 1s. 6d. net.
IN UNKNOWN TUSCANY. With an Appendix by WILLIAM PARKERSON. With 21 Illustrations in Colour, and 26 others. Second Edition. Demy 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.
ROME. With 26 Illustrations in Colour by MAXWELL ARMSTRONG, and 26 other Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo., 6s.
 Hutton (R. H.). See Leader of Religion.
 Hutton (W. H.), M.A. THE LIFE OF SIR THOMAS MORE. With Portraits after Drawings by Holbein. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo., 6s.
 See also Leader of Religion.
 Hyde (A. G.). GEORGE HERBERT AND HIS TIMES. With 20 Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 1s. 6d. net.
 Hyatt (F. A.). FLORENCE: HER HISTORY AND ART TO THE FALL OF THE REPUBLIC. Demy 8vo., 1s. 6d. net.
 Ibsen (Henrik). BRAND. A Drama. Translated by WILLIAM WHITMAN. Fourth Ed. — Cr. 8vo., 1s.
 Ings, W. B. L. M.A. Fathers and Sons of His Time. (See Oxford CHRISTIAN LIBRARY.) (The Religious Leaders of 1888.) Demy 8vo., 1s. 6d. net.
 See also Library of Devotion.

James (A. D.), M.A. A HISTORY OF THE BRITISH IN INDIA. With Maps and Plans. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
ENGLAND UNDER THE TUDORS. With Maps. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

James (Harry). SCHOOLS OF PAINT. 1890. With 18 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 1s. net.

Jenkin. See Churchman's Library.

Jackson (C. E.), B.A. See Treatise of Science.

Jackson (S.), M.A. See Common Sense.

Jackson (P. Hamilton). See Little Gurus.

Jacob (F.), M.A. See Junior Examination Series.

James (J. Stephen). TRUSTS, POOLS, AND CORNERS AS AFFECTING COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
 See also Books on Business.

John (Garrison). A STAR OF THE EAST. 1848. 12mo. 1s. 6d.
 See also Books on the History of Slavery.

John (George W. B.). THE FORTY-SEVEN COLONIES OF NORTH AMERICA 1492-1763. With 8 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Johnson (D. George). THE SYLPHALYR CALS. Super Royal 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Johnson (W. A.). M.A. & C.L. AN OUTLINE OF ENGLISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT. Second Ed. Revised by R. C. E. Keay, M.A. Cr. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

Johnson (Mrs. H.). See Little Books on Art.

Johnson (A. G.), M.A. See Handbook to English Church History.

Johnson (Osbert). B.D. EARLY WOOD CUT INITIALS. Demy 8vo. 1s. net.

Johnson (Osbert Edward). THE BOOKS OF MARMADUKE. Third Ed. 12mo. 1s. net.

Johnson (Anglo-Saxon). B.D. See London or Religion.

Journal (F. D.), M.A., Late D. Princeton University. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.
 See also Churchman's Library and Handbooks of Theology.

Johnson (A. F.), M.A. See Six Ages of European History.

Johnson (Sir H. H.), K.C.B. BRITISH CENTRAL AFRICA. With nearly 200 Illustrations and Six Maps. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 10s. net.

Johnson (F. L.). See Commercial Series.

Johnson (F. P.). See Treatise of Science.

Johnson (L. A. Atherton). B.M.P. and Doctor (Murch, H. J.). M.A. D.C.L. THE MINING AND FURTHER COST OF IRON AND STEEL. N.A. 3 vols.
 THE LAW OF EMPLOYERS AND WORKMEN. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

COMMERCIAL COMPANIES. M.A. PEMS. P. THE INNER LIFE. Serialized. Third Annual Edition. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Johnson (Sam). See Standard Library.

Johnson (Lady of Newgate). PESTLE. 1893. 12mo. 1s. net.

WARRACK. THIRD ED. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Journals. See Classical Translations.

Kappa. LET YOUTH BUT KNOW: A Plan for Reforms in Education. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Kesteven (M.), M.A. SOCIALISM AND MODERN THOUGHT. Second Edition Revised and Enlarged. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Kent (John). THE POEMS. Edited with Introduction and Notes by E. de SELINCOURT, M.A. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure. Second Edition Revised. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

KEPLER OF GERMANY. Selections from the Works of Kepler. 1s. 6d. net.
 See also Little Library and Standard Library.

Kettle (John). THE CHRISTIAN YEAR. With an Introduction and Notes by W. Lucas, D.D., Warden of Kettle College. Illustrated by K. ANNING BELL. Third Edition "Catech." Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.; padded morocco, 3s.
 See also Library of Devotion.

Kelwyn (T. N.), M.D., M.R.C.P. See New Library of Medicine.

Kempt (Thomas). THE INTRODUCTION OF CHRIST. With an Introduction by Dean FARRAR. Illustrated by C. M. GERE. Third Edition. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d.; padded morocco, 3s.
 Also Translated by C. Ross, D.D. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

See also Montgomery (J. E. G. de), Library of Devotion and Standard Library.

Kennedy (James Houghton), D.D., Assistant Lecturer in Divinity at the University of Dublin. See St. Paul.

Kerr (S. Purcell). GEORGE SELWYN AND THE WITS. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Keween (C. W.), M.A. THE CHEMISTRY OF LIFE AND HEALTH. Illustrated. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Kingsley (A. W.). See Little Library.

King (Ferdinand). BARBAC COOM RA and his wife. Translated. Illustrated. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. Fcap. 8vo. Leather. 1s.

THE SEVEN SEAL. 1893. Thirteen. Fifteenth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. Fcap. 8vo. Leather. 1s.

THE FIVE NATIONS. 1893. Thirteen. Sixth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. Fcap. 8vo. Leather. 1s.

DEPARTMENTAL DUTIES. Eighteenth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. Fcap. 8vo. Leather. 1s.

Knight (Albert G.). THE COMPLETE CYCLOPS. 1893. With 10 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Knowling (R. J.), M.A., Professor of New Testament Exegesis in King's College, London. See Westminster Commentary.

GOOD COMPANY: A RALLY OF MEN. Second Edition. Post. 8vo. 5/-.

ONE DAY AND ANOTHER: A Volume of Essays. Third Ed. Post. 8vo. 5/-.

OVER THE MERTON'S: An Easy-Going Chronicle. Sixth Ed. Post. 8vo. 5/-.
See also Lamb (Charles).

Lectures. See Classical Translations.

Lynde (L. W.), M.A. See Commercial Series.

Lydon (See S.) A PUPIL'S MARY GEOMETRY. With numerous Diagrams. Cr. 8vo. 1/-.
See also Junior School Books.

Lytton (Wm. Beck), A. J. LOVE AND TRUTH IN LIFE. Cr. 8vo. 1/-.

M. (R.), THE THOUGHTS OF LUCIA MALIBAY. With some of her Letters. Edited by R. M. Post. 8vo. 1/- net.

Macaulay (Lord). CRITICAL AND HISTORICAL ESSAYS. Edited by C. H. F. & M. A. Three Volumes. Cr. 8vo. 1/-.

McAllan (J. E. B.), M.A. See Commercial Series.

McCabe (Joseph) (formerly Very Rev. T. ANTONY O.S.F.). THE DECAY OF THE CHURCH OF ROME. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

McCorm (Florence A.), MARY STUART. With 44 Illustrations, including a Frontispiece in Photogravure. New and Cheaper Ed. Large Cr. 8vo. 1/-.
See also Leader of Religion.

McDermott (E. R.). See Books on Business.

McDougall (W. Binn). M.A. Oxon. 1911 (Cantab.). AN INTRODUCTION TO SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY. Second Ed. Cr. 8vo. 5s. net.

McDowall (A. B.). See Oxford Lectures.

MacFie (Ronald G.), M.A., M.B. See New Library of Medicine.

MacKay (A. M.), B.A. See Chetham's Library.

MacKenzie (W. Leslie), M.A., B.D. I. P.H. &c. THE HEALTH OF THE BOHEMIAN CHILD. Cr. 8vo. 1/-.

MacKillop (Herbert W.), B.A. See Antiquary's Books.

McNally (A. H.), B.D. See Westminster Commemoration.

*Madame Bovary (Author of). ST. CATHERINE IN THE CITTA AND HER TIMES. With 25 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Mahomette (Maurice). THE BLUE BOX: A FAIRY PLAY in Five Acts. Translated by ALEXANDER TRISTRAM DE MATTOX. Ninth Edition. Post. 8vo. Double Edges. 1/- net. Also in Paper Covers. 1/- net.

Magnus (Laurie), M.A. A PRIMER OF WORLD HISTORY. Cr. 8vo. 1/-.

Magoffin (J. P.), LL.D. A HISTORY OF THE EGYPT OF THE PTOLEMIES. With 79 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Maitland (P. W.), M.A., LL.D. ROMAN CANON LAW IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. Reprint. Cr. 8vo. 1/-.

Majer (R.), B.A., B.D. A HEALTH AND TEMPERANCE READER. Cr. 8vo. 1/-.

Maiden (R. E.), M.A. ENGLISH RECORDS: A Companion to the History of England. Cr. 8vo. 1/-.

THE RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF A CITIZEN. Sixth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1/-.

See also School Histories.

Merchant (E. C.), M.A. Fellow of Peterhouse Cambridge. A GREAT ANTHOLOGY. Cr. 8vo. 1/-.

See also Cook (A. N.).

Massey (R. R.), M.A. Fellow and Tutor of Exeter College, Oxford. THE THRESHOLD OF RELIGION. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

Marks (Jesuitess), M.A. ENGLISH PASTORAL DRAMA from the Restoration to the date of the publication of the 'Lyrical Ballads' (1800-1798). Cr. 8vo. 3s. net.

Mary (A. E.), F.R.S. Fellow of St John's College, Cambridge. THE SCIENTIFIC STUDY OF SOCIETY. 7th Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1/-.

MAY IT BE GOOD (Cr.) Illustrated. Cr. 8vo. 1/-.

Mazzoni (Charles). A SPANISH NOVEL. Cr. 8vo. With 12 Illustrations by A. D. Frazee and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Merrill (A. R.), M.A. THE LIFE AND TIMES OF LORD BYRON. With 25 Illustrations. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
See also Six Ages of European History.

Marvell (Andrew). See Little Library.

Masefield (John). SEA LIFE IN NELSON'S TIME. With 26 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 1/-.

ON THE SPANISH MAIN: or, Some English Forays in the Islands of DABER. With 22 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo. 1/-.

A SAILOR'S GARLAND. Selected and arranged. Cr. 8vo. 1/-.

AN ENGLISH PROSE MISCELLANY. Selected and Edited by Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Moore (A.). See Commissioner's Library.

Moses & JESUS. See audience of Jesus.

Masterton (G. F. O.), M.A., B.P. TENNYSON AS A RELIGIOUS TEACHER. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE CONDITION OF ENGLAND. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Masterson (J. H. B.), M.A. See Six Ages of European History.

Matthews (R. P.). COUNSELS OF LIFE. Post. 8vo. 1/-. 6d. net.

Meade (A. M.), M.A. See Handbook of Log in Class & Library.

May (Phil). THE PHIL MAY ALBUM. Second Edition. 1/- to one/-

Mayne (Edmund Gosse). ENCHANTERS OF MEN. With 25 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 1/-. 6d. net.

Williams (A.), PETROL PETER: A Poetry Story and Penny Pictures. Illustrated in Colour by A. W. Mills. Demy 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

Williamson (Mr. G.), M.A. See Antwerp. Cr. 8vo.

Williamson (W.), B.A. See Junior Education Series. Junior School Books, and Beginner's Books.

Willmot-Burton (E. M.), F.R.Hist.S. MAKERS OF EUROPE. Outline of European History for the Middle Forms of Schools. With 25 Maps. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

THE ANCIENT WORLD. With Maps and Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

A BOOK OF NOBLE WOMEN. With 16 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

A HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN from the Coming of the Angles to the Year 1066. With 25 Maps. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 12s. 6d.

BY LAND AND RIVER. A Descriptive Geography of the British Isles. With 12 Illustrations and 2 Maps. Cr. 8vo. 10s. 6d. See also Beginner's Books and New Histories.

Wilson (Bishop.). See Library of Devotion.

Wilson (A. J.). See Books on Business.

Wilson (H. A.). See Boxes or Cases.

Wilson (Richard), M.A. LYRA PASTORALIS: Songs of Nature, Church, and Home. Post 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Winkett (S. E.), M.A. EXERCISES IN LATIN LITERATURE. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

LATIN HISTORIANS FOR YOUNG ADOLESCENTS. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Windle (H. C. A.), D.Sc., F.R.S., F.R.A. See Antiquary's Books, Little Guides, Ancient Cities, and School Histories.

Wood (Sir Evelyn), R.A. V.C., O.C.B., O.C.M.G. FROM MID-HIPPIAN TO FIELD-MARSHAL. With Illustrations, and 2 Maps. Full and Chester Edition. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

THE REVOLT IN HINDUSTAN. 1857-58. With 8 Illustrations and 2 Maps. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Wood (J. A. E.) See Testimony of Technology.

Wood (J. Hickney). DAN LENO. Illustrated. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Wood (W. Birkbeck). M.A., late Scholar of Worcester College, Oxford, and Edmunds (Master J. H.), R.E., D.A.Q.M.G. A HISTORY OF THE CIVIL WAR IN THE UNITED STATES. With an Introduction by R. Stephen Wilkinson. With 25 Maps and Plans. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Wordsworth (Christopher), M.A. See Antiquary's Books.

Wordsworth (W.). THE POEMS OF. With an Introduction and Notes by Norman C. Smith, late Fellow of New College, Oxford. In Three Volumes. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d.

POEMS BY WILLIAM WORDSWORTH. Selected with an Introduction by Stopford A. Brooke. With 16 Illustrations by E. H. New, including a Frontispiece in Photography. Cr. 8vo. 9s. 6d. net.

See also Little Library.

Wordsworth (W.) and Coleridge (S. T.). See Little Library.

Wright (Arthur), D.D., Fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge. See Choristers' Library.

Wright (G. Gordon). See Dogs.

Wright (J. C.). TO-DAY. Thoughts on Life for every day. Demy 16mo. 1s. 6d. net.

Wright (Sophie). GERMAN VOCABULARIES FOR REPETITION. Second Edition. Post 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Wyatt (Miss M.). See Girls' D.L.R.s.

Wynne (A. D.). MODERN ADVISER. With a Map and a Frontispiece. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Wyllie (R. A.). NORWAY AND ITS FJORDS. With Illustrations, in Colour by W. L. Williams, R.A., and 17 other Illustrators. Second Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Wyndham (Oscar). See Shakespeare (Wm.).

Yeats (W. B.). A BOOK OF IRISH VERSE. Revised and Enlarged Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Young (Eliza). THE COMPLETE MOTORIST. With 128 Illustrations. New Edition (Second), with many additional. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

THE JOY OF THE ROAD: An Appreciation of the Motor Car. With a Frontispiece in Photography. Sm. Demy 8vo. 1s. net.

Zacharias of Mykyta. See Byzantine Texts.

Zimmerman (Antonius). WHAT DO WE KNOW CONCERNING ELECTRICITY? Post 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

Ancient Cities

General Editor, H. C. A. WINDLE, D.Sc., F.R.A.

Cr. 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

BRIXTON. By Alfred Harvey, M.B. Illustrated by E. H. New.

CANTERBURY. By J. C. Cox, LL.D., F.R.A. Illustrated by E. C. Bouter.

CHESTER. By H. C. A. Windle, D.Sc., F.R.S. Illustrated by E. H. New.

DUBLIN. By J. A. J. Flanagan. Illustrated by W. C. Green.

EDINBURGH. By W. G. Williamson, M.A. Illustrated by Herbert Railton.

LEEDS. By S. Mervin Evans, M.A., M.D. Illustrated by E. H. New.

NEWCASTLE. By T. Astor, M.A., F.R.A. Illustrated by Katherine M. Roberts.

WELLS AND GLASTONBURY. By T. S. Hobson. Illustrated by E. H. New.

The Antiquary's Books

General Editor, J. CHARLES COX, LL.D., F.S.A.

Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

ARCHAEOLOGY AND EARLY ANTIQUITIES.
By R. Muir, LL.D. With 81 Illustrations.BELLS OF ENGLAND. THE. By Canon J. J. Reyer, D.D., F.S.A. With 64 Illustrations. *Second Edition.BRASSES OF ENGLAND. THE. By Herbert W. Macklin, B.I.A. With 83 Illustrations. *Second Edition.CELTIC ART IN PAGAN AND CHRISTIAN TIMES. By J. Romilly Allen, F.S.A. With 44 Plates and numerous Illustrations.Domesday Enquiry. THE. By Adolphus Billard, B.A., LL.B. With 27 Illustrations.ENGLISH CHURCH FURNITURE. By J. C. Cox, LL.D., F.S.A., and A. Harvey, M.B. With 191 Illustrations. *Second Edition.ENGLISH COSTUME. From Prehistoric Times to the End of the Eighteenth Century. By George Crouch, F.G.S. With 131 Illustrations.ENGLISH MONASTIC LIFE. By the Right Rev. Abbot Gasquet, O.S.B. With 50 Illustrations, Maps and Plans. *Fourth Edition.ENGLISH SEALS. By J. Harvey Bloom. With 93 Illustrations.FAIR-LAW AS AN HISTORICAL SCIENCE. By G. L. Cowles. With 28 Illustrations.GILDS AND COMPANIES OF LONDON. THE. By George Willis. With 37 Illustrations.MAYOR AND MANORIAL RECORDS. THE. By Nathaniel J. Home. With 94 Illustrations.MEDIEVAL HOSPITALS OF ENGLAND. THE. By Rodha Mary Clay. With many Illustrations.OBITUARY BOOKS OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH. By Christopher Wordsworth, M.A., and Henry Littlehales. With 38 Coloured and other Illustrations.PARISH LIFE IN MEDIEVAL ENGLAND. By the Right Rev. Abbott Gasquet, O.S.B. With 39 Illustrations. *Second Edition.REMAINS OF THE PAINTED ART IN ENGLAND. By R. C. A. Windle, D.Sc., F.R.S. With 94 Illustrations. *Second Edition.ROYAL FORESTS OF ENGLAND. THE. By J. C. Cox, LL.D., F.S.A. With 45 Plates and 23 other Illustrations.SHRINES OF BRITISH SAINTS. By J. C. Wall. With 21 Plates and 10 other Illustrations.

The Arden Shakespeare

Demy 8vo. 2s. 6d. net each volume.

An edition of Shakespeare in single Plays. Edited with a full Introduction, Textual Notes, and a Commentary at the foot of the page.

All's Well That Ends Well. Edited by W. O. Keightley.Antony and Cleopatra. Edited by R. H. Carr.Cymbeline. Edited by E. Dowden.Comedy of Errors. THE. Edited by Henry Cunningham.Hamlet. Edited by E. Dowden. *Second Edition.Julius Caesar. Edited by M. Macmillan.King Henry V. Edited by H. A. Evans.King Henry VI. Pt. I. Edited by H. C. Hart.King Henry VI. Pt. II. Edited by H. C. Hart and C. K. Pooler.King Lear. Edited by W. J. Craig.King Richard III. Edited by A. H. Thompson.Life and Death of King John. THE. Edited by Ivor B. John.Lovely Labour's Lost. Edited by M. C. Hart.Macbeth. Edited by H. Cunningham.Measure for Measure. Edited by E. C. Hart.Merchant of Venice. THE. Edited by C. K. Pooler.Merry Wives of Windsor. THE. Edited by H. C. Hart.A Midsummer Night's Dream. Edited by H. Cunningham.Othello. Edited by H. C. Hart.Pericles. Edited by K. Deighton.Romeo and Juliet. Edited by Edward Dowden.Taming of the Shrew. THE. Edited by R. Warwick Bond.Tempest. THE. Edited by M. Luca.Timon of Athens. Edited by K. Deighton.Titus Andronicus. Edited by H. B. Baldwin.Twelfth Night. Edited by K. Deighton.Two Gentlemen of Verona. THE. Edited by R. W. Bond.Twelfth Night. Edited by M. Luca.

The Beginner's Books

Edited by W. WILLIAMSON, B.A.

EASY DICTION AND SPELLING. By W. Williamson, B.A. Second Ed. Fourth Imp. 1s.
EASY EXERCISES IN ARITHMETIC. Arranged by W. S. Beard. Third Edition. Fourth Imp. Without Answers, 1s. With Answers, 1s. 6d.
EASY FRENCH READER. By Henri Blouet. Second Edition. Illustrated. Fourth Imp. 1s.
AN EASY POETRY BOOK. Selected and arranged by W. Williamson, B.A. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

EASY STORIES FROM ENGLISH HISTORY. By E. M. Wilmet-Buxton, F.R.Hist.S. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

A PICTORIAL HISTORY OF GREECE. By E. E. Fitch. With 7 Maps. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

STORIES FROM ROMAN HISTORY. By E. M. Wilmet-Buxton. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

STORIES FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT. By E. M. Wilmet-Buxton. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Books on Business

Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY, THE. G. Holden Stone.
BREWING INDUSTRY, THE. J. L. Baker. F.I.C., F.C.S. With 8 Illustrations.
BUSINESS OF ADVERTISING, THE. C. G. Moran. With 21 Illustrations.
BUSINESS SIDE OF AGRICULTURE, THE. A. G. L. Rogers.
BUSINESS OF INSURANCE, THE. A. J. Wilson.
CIVIL ENGINEERING. C. T. Failes. With 15 Illustrations.
COTTON INDUSTRY AND TRADE, THE. S. J. Chapman. With 8 Illustrations.
THE ELECTRICAL INDUSTRY: LIGHTING, TRACTION, AND POWER. A. G. Whyte.
IRON TRADE OF GREAT BRITAIN THE. J. S. Jeans. With 12 Illustrations.

LAW IN BUSINESS. H. A. Wilson.
MINING AND MINING INVESTMENTS. A. Abel.

MONEY MARKET, THE. F. Steiner.
MONOPOLIES, TRUSTS, AND KARTELLS. F. W. Hirst.

PORTS AND DOCKS. Douglas Owen.
RAILWAYS. E. R. McDermott.
SHIPBUILDING INDUSTRY THE: Its History, Practice, Science, and Finance. David Pollock, M.I.M.A.
STOCK EXCHANGE, THE. C. Duguid. Second Edition.
TRADE UNION. G. Drage.

Bysantine

Edited by J. B. BURY, M.A., LL.D.

THE SYRIAC CHRONICLE KNOWN AS THAT OF ZACHARIAS OF MITYLENE. Translated by F. J. Hamilton, D.D., and E. W. Brooks. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

THE HISTORY OF PHILIP. Edited by C. Sissons. Demy 8vo. 1s. net.
EUTHESIAS CHRONICA AND CHRONICON ATTICUM. Edited by Professor S. P. Lambourne. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

EVAGARIUS. Edited by L. Bidez and Léon Parmentier. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

THE CHRONICLE OF MOREA. Edited by John Schaff. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

The Churchman's Bible

General Editor, J. H. BURN, B.D., F.R.S.E.

Fourth Imp. 1s. 6d. net each.

THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE GALATIANS. Explained by A. W. Robinson, M.A. Second Edition.

ISAIAH. Explained by W. E. Barnes, D.D. Two Volumes. With Map. 2s. net each.

THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS. Explained by C. R. D. Biggs, D.D. Second Edition.

THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE EPHESIANS. Explained by G. H. Whiteaker, M.A.

THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS AND PHILEMON. Explained by H. W. Fulford, M.A.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MARK. Explained by J. C. Da Rainon, M.A. 2s. 6d. net.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS AND PHILEMON. Explained by H. J. C. Knight. 1s. net.

The Churchman's Library

General Editor, J. H. BURN, B.D., F.R.S.E.

Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

THE BEGINNINGS OF ENGLISH CHRISTIANITY.

By W. H. Collis, M.A. With Map.

THE CHURCHMAN'S INTRODUCTION TO THE OLD TESTAMENT. By A. M. Mackay, B.A.

Second Edition.

EVOLUTION. By F. E. Jevons, M.A., LL.D.

SOME NEW TESTAMENT PROBLEMS. By Arthur Wright, D.D. 6s.

THE WORKMANSHIP OF THE PRAYER BOOK:

its Literary and Liturgical Aspects. By J.

Dowden, D.D. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged.

Classical Translations

Crown 8vo.

AESCHYLUS—The Orestian Trilogy (Agamemnon, Choephorae, Eumenides). Translated by Lewis Campbell, LL.D. 5s.

CICERO—De Oratore I. Translated by E. N. P. Moor, M.A. Second Edition. 3s. 6d.

CICERO—The Speeches against Catalina and Antony and for Murena and Milo. Translated by H. E. D. Blakiston, M.A. 5s.

CICERO—De Natura Deorum. Translated by F. Brooks, M.A. 3s. 6d.

CICERO—De Officiis. Translated by G. R. Gardiner, M.A. 3s. 6d.

HORACE—The Odes and Epodes. Translated by A. D. Godley, M.A. 2s.

LUCRAN—Six Dialogues. Translated by S. T. Irwin, M.A. 3s. 6d.

SOCRATES—Ajax and Electra. Translated by E. D. Northcote, M.A. 2s. 6d.

TACITUS—Agripila and Germania. Translated by R. H. Townshend. 2s. 6d.

JUVENAL—Thirteen Satires. Translated by S. G. Owen, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Classics of Art

Edited by DR. J. H. W. LAING.

Wide Royal 8vo. 21s. top.

THE ART OF THE GREEKS. By H. B. Walters. With 200 Plates and 25 Illustrations in the Text. 22s. 6d. net.

FLORENTINE SCULPTORS OF THE RENAISSANCE. By Wilhelm Bode, Ph.D. Translated by Jessie Maynes. With 90 Plates. 12s. 6d. net.

CHIARALDIO. By Gerald S. Davies, Master of the Charterhouse. With 50 Plates. Second Edition. 10s. 6d.

MICHELANGELO. By Gerald S. Davies, Master of the Charterhouse. With 200 Plates. 22s. 6d. net.

Raphael. By Edward Dillon, M.A. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure and 48 Plates. 22s. net.

RAPHAEL. By A. P. Oppé. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure and 200 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

TITIAN. By Charles Ricquier. With about 200 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

VELASQUEZ. By A. de Beruete. With 54 Plates. 10s. 6d. net.

Commercial Series

Crown 8vo.

BRITISH COMMERCE AND COLONIES FROM ELIZABETH TO VICTORIA. By H. de B. Gibbons, LL.D., M.A. Fourth Edition. 2s.

COMMERCIAL EXAMINATION PAPERS. By H. de B. Gibbons, LL.D., M.A. 1s. 6d.

THE ECONOMICS OF COMMERCE. By H. de B. Gibbons, LL.D., M.A. Second Edition. 1s. 6d.

A GERMAN COMMERCIAL READER. By S. E. Bally. With Vocabulary. 2s.

A COMMERCIAL GEOGRAPHY OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE. By L. W. Lyde, M.A. Eighth Edition. 2s.

A COMMERCIAL GEOGRAPHY OF FOREIGN NATIONS. By F. C. Bunn, B.A. 2s.

A PRIMER OF BUSINESS. By S. Jackson, M.A. Fourth Edition. 1s. 6d.

A SHORT COMMERCIAL ARITHMETIC. By F. G. Taylor, M.A. Fourth Edition. 1s. 6d.

FRENCH COMMERCIAL CORRESPONDENCE. By S. E. Bally. With Vocabulary. Fourth Edition. 2s.

GERMAN COMMERCIAL CORRESPONDENCE. By S. E. Bally. With Vocabulary. Second Edition. 1s. 6d.

A FRENCH COMMERCIAL READER. By S. E. Bally. With Vocabulary. Second Edition. 1s.

PRICES WRITING AND OFFICE CORRESPONDENCE. By E. E. Whistfeld, M.A. Second Edition. 1s.

AN ENTRANCE GUIDE TO PROFESSIONS AND BUSINESSES. By H. Jones. 1s. 6d.

THE PRINCIPLES OF BOOK-KEEPING BY DOUBLE ENTRY. By J. B. B. McAlon, M.A. 2s.

COMMERCIAL LAW. By W. Douglas Edwards. Second Edition. 2s.

The Collector's Library

With Royal 8vo. 85s. net.

MINIATURES. By Cyril Deshayes. With 40 Plates in Photogravure.

PORCELAIN. By Edward Dillon. With 19 Plates in Colour, 11 in Collotype, and 3 in Photogravure.

MINIATURES. By Dudley North. With 5 Plates in Colour, 11 in Collotype, and 15 in Photogravure.

MINIATURES. By A. Mackell. With 10 Plates in Collotype and Photogravure.

ENGLISH FURNITURE. By F. R. Robinson. With 100 Plates in Collotype and one in Photogravure. Second Edition.

ENGLISH COOKERY BOOKS. By Martin Hardie. With 51 Illustrations in Colour and Collotype.

EUROPEAN ENAMELS. By Henry H. Courtney. With 24 Plates in Collotype and Half-tone and 4 Plates in Colour.

CLOISONNÉ AND SILVERSMITH'S WORK. By Nelson Dawson. With 51 Plates in Collotype and a Frontispiece in Photogravure. Second Edition.

GLASS. By Edward Dillon. With 37 Illustrations in Collotype and 12 in Colour.

SEALS. By Walter de Grey Birch. With 50 Illustrations in Collotype and a Frontispiece in Photogravure.

JEWELLERY. By H. Clifford Smith. With 50 Illustrations in Collotype, and 4 in Colour. Second Edition.

Handbooks of English Church History

Edited by J. H. BURN, B.D. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

THE FOUNDATIONS OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH. J. H. Maude.

THE SAXON CHURCH AND THE NORMAN CONQUEST. C. T. CATTWELL.

THE MEDIEVAL CHURCH AND THE PAPACY. A. C. Jennings.

THE REFORMATION PERIOD. By Henry Cox.

The Illustrated Pocket Library of Plain and Coloured Books

Fcap 8vo. 3s. 6d. net each volume.

COLOURED BOOKS

OLD COLOURED BOOKS. By George Paston. With 16 Coloured Plates. First Edit. 1s. net.

THE LIFE AND DEATH OF JOHN MYTON. Etc. By Nasred. With 11 Coloured Plates by Henry Alken and T. J. Rawlins. Third Edition.

THE LIFE OF A BREAKFAST. By Nasred. With 33 Coloured Plates by Henry Alken.

HAWTHORNE CROSS. By R. S. Surtees. With 17 Coloured Plates and 100 Woodcuts in the Text by John Leech. Third Edition.

MR. SPONGE'S SPENDING TOUR. By R. S. Surtees. With 17 Coloured Plates and 90 Woodcuts in the Text by John Leech.

FOOTMAN'S JAUNTS AND JOLTINGS. By R. S. Surtees. With 15 Coloured Plates by H. Alken. Second Edition.

ABC MAMMA. By R. S. Surtees. With 13 Coloured Plates and 90 Woodcuts in the Text by John Leech.

THE ANALYSIS OF THE HUNTING FIELD. By R. S. Surtees. With 9 Coloured Plates by Henry Alken, and 43 Illustrations on Wood.

THE TOUR OF DR. SYNTAX IN SEARCH OF THE PICTURESQUE. By William Combe. With 30 Coloured Plates by T. Rowlandson.

THE TOUR OF DOCTOR SYNTAX IN SEARCH OF CONSOLATION. By William Combe. With 24 Coloured Plates by T. Rowlandson.

THE THIRD TOUR OF DOCTOR SYNTAX IN SEARCH OF A WIFE. By William Combe. With 24 Coloured Plates by T. Rowlandson.

THE HISTORY OF JOHNSON QUACK CAXX: the Little Foundling of the late Dr. Syntax. By the Author of 'The Three Tours.' With 24 Coloured Plates by Rowlandson.

THE ENGLISH DANCE OF DEATH, from the Designs of T. Rowlandson, with 16 original Illustrations by the Author of 'Doctor Syntax.' Two Volumes.

This book contains 76 Coloured Plates.

THE DANCE OF LIFE. A Poem. By the Author of 'Doctor Syntax.' Illustrated with 26 Coloured Engravings by T. Rowlandson.

LIFE IN LONDON: or, the Day and Night Scenes of Jerry Hawthorn, Esq., and his Elegant Friend, Countess Tom. By Pierce Egae. With 36 Coloured Plates by T. R. and G. Cruikshank. With numerous Designs on Wood.

WHAT LIFE IS LIKE: or, the Rambling and Adventures of Bob Tally-ho, Esq., and his Cousin, The Hon. Tom Dashall. By an Amateur (Pierce Egae). With 32 Coloured Plates by Alken and Rowlandson, etc. Two Volumes.

THE LIFE OF AN ACTOR. By Pierce Egae. With 32 Coloured Plates by Theodore Lane, and several Designs on Wood.

THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD. By Oliver Goldsmith. With 41 Coloured Plates by T. Rowlandson.

THE MILITARY ADVENTURES OF JOHNSON NEWCOME. By an Officer. With 13 Coloured Plates by T. Rowlandson.

ILLUSTRATED POCKET LIBRARY OF PLATE AND COLOURED BOOKS—continued.

THE NATIONAL SPORTS OF GREAT BRITAIN. With Descriptions and 30 Coloured Plates by Henry Alken.

THE ADVENTURES OF A POST CAPTAIN. By A Naval Officer. With 34 Coloured Plates by Mr. Williams.

GARDENIA; OR, THE ART OF PRESERVING GREEN: and an Improved Method of making Plantations and Covers, explained and illustrated by Lawrence Rowntree, Esq. With 13 Coloured Plates by T. Rowntree.

AN ACADEMY FOR GROWN HUMOUR. Containing the completest Instructions for Walking, Trotting, Cantering, Galloping, Stumbung, and Tumbung. Illustrated with 30 Coloured Plates, and adorned with a Portrait of the Author. By Godfrey Gammie, Esq.

THE GRAVE: A POEM. By Robert Blair. Illustrated by 11 Engravings executed by Louis Scharpenetti from the original Engravings of William Blake. Within Engraved Title Page and a Portrait of Blake by T. Phillips, R.A. The illustrations are reproduced in photogravure.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE BOOK OF JOSEPH. Engraved and engraved by William Blake.

These famous Illustrations—11 in number—are reproduced in photogravure.

WINDSOR CASTLE. By W. Harrison Ainsworth. With 28 Plates and 51 Woodcuts in the Text by George Cruikshank.

REAL LIFE IN IRELAND, or, the Day and Night Scenes of Brian Dorn, Esq., and his Elegant Friend, Sir Shawn O'Dogherty. By a Real Padgy. With 24 Coloured Plates by Heath, Marks, etc.

THE ADVENTURES OF JONATHAN NEWTON IN THE NAVY. By Alfred Burton. With 26 Coloured Plates by T. Rowlandson.

THE OLD ENGLISH SONGS: A POEM. By John Cowper, Esq. With 10 Coloured Plates after the style of T. Rowlandson.

THE ENGLISH SMY. By Bernard Blacksmith. An original Work, characteristic, Satirical, Humorous, comprising scenes and sketches in every rank of Society, being Portraits of the Illustrious, Eminent, Eccentric, and Notorious. With 15 Coloured Plates by R. Cundall, and many Illustrations in wood. Two Volumes. 2s. net.

PLAIN BOOKS

THE TOWN OF LARSEN. By W. Harrison Ainsworth. With 40 Plates and 51 Woodcuts in the Text by George Cruikshank.

FRANCIS FARNOLDE. By F. E. Smedley. With 30 Plates by George Cruikshank.

HANDY AXES. By Samuel Lover. With 24 Illustrations by the Author.

THE COMPLEAT ANGLER. By Izaak Walton and Charles Cotton. With 14 Plates and 77 Woodcuts in the Text.

THE PICKWICK PAPERS. By Charles Dickens. With the 43 Illustrations by Seymour and Phiz, the two Bust Plates, and the 32 Contemporary Owlbury Plates.

JUNIOR EXAMINATION PAPERS

Edited by A. M. M. STEDMAN, M.A. Post-Boy. 2s.

JUNIOR ALGEBRA EXAMINATION PAPERS. By S. W. Firth, M.A.

JUNIOR ARITHMETIC EXAMINATION PAPERS. By W. S. Board. Fifth Edition.

JUNIOR ENGLISH EXAMINATION PAPERS. By W. Williamson, B.A. Second Edition.

JUNIOR FRENCH EXAMINATION PAPERS. By F. Jacob, M.A. Second Edition.

JUNIOR GENERAL INFORMATION EXAMINATION PAPERS. By W. S. Board. Kev. 2s. 6d. net.

JUNIOR GEOGRAPHY EXAMINATION PAPERS. By W. G. Baker, M.A.

JUNIOR GREEK EXAMINATION PAPERS. By A. Voegelin, M.A.

JUNIOR GREEK EXAMINATION PAPERS. By T. C. Weatherhead, M.A. Kev. 2s. 6d. net.

JUNIOR LATIN EXAMINATION PAPERS. By C. G. Boileau, B.A. Sixth Edition. Kev. 2s. 6d. net.

JUNIOR HISTORY EXAMINATION PAPERS. By W. G. F. Davis.

Methuen's Junior School-Books

Edited by O. D. INSKIP, LL.D., and W. WILLIAMSON, B.A.

A CLASS-BOOK OF DICTIONARY PAPERS. By W. Williamson, B.A. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MATTHEW. Edited by E. Wilson South, M.A. With Three Maps. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MARK. Edited by A. E. Robt., D.D. With Three Maps. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

A JUNIOR ENGLISH GRAMMAR. By W. Williamson, B.A. With numerous passages for parsing and analysis, and a chapter on Early Writing. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 2s.

A JUNIOR SPANISH. By E. A. Tyler, B.A., F.C.S. With 50 Illustrations.  Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. Edited by A. E. Robt., D.D. Cr. 8vo. 2s.

METHUEN'S JUNIOR SCHOOL BOOKS—continued.

A JUNIOR FRENCH GRAMMAR. By L. A. Sovest and M. J. Ascole. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

ELEMENTARY EXPERIMENTAL SCIENCE. PHYSICS by W. T. Clough, A.R.C.Sc. (Lond.), F.C.S. CHEMISTRY by A. E. Dunstan, B.Sc. (Lond.), F.C.S. With 2 Plates and 154 Diagrams. Eighth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

A JUNIOR GEOMETRY. By Noel S. Lydon. With 276 Diagrams. Seventh Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

ELEMENTARY EXPERIMENTAL CHEMISTRY. By A. E. Dunstan, B.Sc. (Lond.), F.C.S. With 4 Plates and 102 Diagrams. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

A JUNIOR FRENCH PROSE. By R. R. N. Bacon, M.A. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. LUKE. With an Introduction and Notes by William Williams, B.A. With Three Maps. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

THE FIRST BOOK OF KING. Edited by A. E. Russel, D.D. With 4 Maps. Cr. 8vo. 1s.

A JUNIOR GREEK HISTORY. By W. H. Sprague, M.A. With 4 Illustrations and 3 Maps. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

A SCHOOL LATIN GRAMMAR. By H. G. Ford, M.A. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

A JUNIOR LATIN PROSE. By H. N. Atman, M.A., B.D. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

ELEMENTARY EXPERIMENTAL ELECTRICITY AND MAGNETISM. By W. T. Clough, A.R.C.Sc. (Lond.), F.C.S. With 102 Illustrations and Diagrams. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

ENGLISH LITERATURE FOR SCHOOLS. By Edith E. Fifth. With 4 Maps. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Leaders of Religion

Edited by H. C. BEECHING, M.A. Canon of Westminster. With Portraits.
Cr. 8vo. 1s. net.

CARDINAL NEWMAN. By R. H. Hutton.
JOHN WESLEY. By J. H. Overton, M.A.
BISHOP WILBERFORCE. By G. W. Densell, M.A.
CARDINAL MANNING. By A. W. Hutton, M.A.
CHARLES SIMPSON. By H. C. G. Moule, D.D.
JOHN KNOX. By F. MacCunn. Second Edition.
JOHN HOWE. By R. P. Horton, D.D.
THOMAS KIRK. By F. A. Clarke, M.A.
GEORGE FOX, THE QUAKER. By T. Hodgkin, D.C.L. Third Edition.
JOHN KEELER. By Walter Lock, D.D.

THOMAS CHALMERS. By Mrs. Oliphant.
LAUNCELOT ANDREWES. By R. L. Oakeley, D.D. Second Edition.
AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY. By E. L. Cutts, D.D.
WILLIAM LAUD. By W. H. Hutton, M.A. Third Edition.
JOHN DONNE. By Augustus Jessopp, D.D.
THOMAS CRANMER. By A. J. Mason, D.D.
BISHOP LATIMER. By R. M. Carlyle and A. J. Carlyle, M.A.
BISHOP BUTLER. By W. A. Spooner, M.A.

The Library of Devotion

With Introductions and (where necessary) Notes.

Small Post 8vo, cloth, 2s.; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

THE CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE. Edited by C. Bigg, D.D. Seventh Edition.
THE INITIATION OF CHRIST: called also the Ecclesiastical Music. Edited by C. Bigg, D.D. Fifth Edition.
THE CHRISTIAN YEAR. Edited by Walter Lock, D.D. Fourth Edition.
LYRA INNOCENTIA. Edited by Walter Lock, D.D. Second Edition.
THE TEMPLE. Edited by E. C. S. Gibson, D.D. Second Edition.
A BOOK OF DEVOTIONS. Edited by J. W. Stanbridge, B.D. Second Edition.
A SERIOUS CALL TO A DEVOUT AND HOLY LIFE. Edited by C. Bigg, D.D. Fourth Ed.
A GUIDE TO ETERNITY. Edited by J. W. Stanbridge, B.D.
THE INNER WAY. By J. Taylor. Edited by A. W. Hutton, M.A. Second Edition.

ON THE LOVE OF GOD. By St. Francis de Sales. Edited by W. J. Knox-Liute, M.A.
THE PSALMS OF DAVID. Edited by B. W. Randolph, D.D.
LYRA APOSTOLICA. By Cardinal Newman and others. Edited by Canon Scott Holland, M.A., and Canon H. C. Beeching, M.A.
THE SONG OF SONGS. Edited by R. Blolland, M.A.
THE THOUGHTS OF PASCAL. Edited by C. S. Jettmar, M.A. Second Edition.
A MANUAL OF CONSOLATION FROM THE SAINTS AND FATHERS. Edited by J. H. Burn, B.D.
DEVOTIONS FROM THE APOCRYPHA. Edited, with an Introduction, by Herbert Pentecost, M.A.

THE LIBRARY OF DEVOTION—CONTINUED.

THE SPIRITUAL COMBAT. By Don Lorenzo Scopoli. Newly translated, with an Introduction and Notes, by Thomas Barnes, M.A.

THE DEVOTIONS OF ST. ANSELM. Edited by C. C. J. Webb, B.D.

GRACE ABSOUNDING TO THE CHILD OF SINNED. By John Bunyan. Edited by S. C. Free, M.A.

BISHOP WILSON'S SACRED PRIVATE. Edited by A. E. Burn, B.D.

LYRA SACRA: A Book of Sacred Verse. Edited by Canon H. C. Beeching, M.A. Second Edition, revised.

A DAY BOOK FROM THE SAINTS AND FATHERS. Edited by J. H. Burn, B.D.

A LITTLE BOOK OF HEAVENLY WISDOM. A Selection from the English Mystics. Edited by E. C. Gregory.

LIGHT, LIFE, and LOVE. A Selection from the German Mystics. Edited by W. R. Inge, M.A.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE DEVOUT LIFE. By St. Francis de Sales. Translated and Edited by T. Barnes, M.A.

THE LITTLE FLOWERS OF THE GLORIOUS MESSER ST. FRANCIS AND OF HIS FRIENDS. Done into English by W. Heywood. With an Introduction by A. G. Ferrers Howell.

MANCHESTER AL MONDO: a Contemplation of Death and Immortality. By Henry Montagu Earl of Manchester. With an Introduction by Elizabeth Waterhouse, Editor of 'A Little Book of Life and Death.'

THE SPIRITUAL GUIDE, which Disentangles the Soul and brings it by the Inward Way to the Function of Perfect Contemplation, and the Rich Treasure of Internal Peace. Written by Dr. Michael de Molina, Priest. Translated from the Italian copy, printed at Venice, 1645. Edited with an Introduction by Kathleen Lyttleton. And a Note by Canon Scott Holland.

DEVOTIONS FOR EVERY DAY OF THE WEEK AND THE GREAT FESTIVALS. By John Wesley. Edited, with an Introduction by Canon C. Bodington.

PUECAS PRIVATAS. By Lancelot Andrewes, Bishop of Winchester. Selections from the Translation by Canon F. E. Brightman. Edited, with an Introduction, by A. E. Burn D.D.

HORAE MYSTICAE: A Day Book from the Writings of Mystics of Many Nations. Edited by E. C. Gregory.

Little Books on Art

With many Illustrations. Demy 16mo. 2s. 6d. net.

Each volume consists of about 300 pages, and contains from 30 to 40 illustrations, including a Frontispiece in Photogravure.

ALBRECHT DÜRER. J. Allen.
ARTS OF JAPAN. THO. E. Dillon.
BOOKPLATES. E. Jilmark.
BOTTICELLI. Mary L. Bonner.
BUENSE-JONES. F. de Lisle.
CHRIST IN ART. Mrs. H. Jeanner.
CLAUDE. E. Dillon.
CONSTABLE. H. W. Tompkins.
COROT. A. Pollard and E. Burttagli.
ENAMELL. Mrs. N. Dawson.
FREDERIC LEIGHTON. A. Corkran.
GEORGE ROMNEY. G. Paxton.
GREEK ART. H. B. Walters.
GREUZE AND BOUCHER. E. F. Pollard.
HOLBEIN. Mrs. G. Fortescue.

ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS. J. W. Bradley.
JEWELLERY. C. Davenport.
JOHN HOFFNER. H. P. K. Skipton.
SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS. J. Sime.
MILLET. N. Peacock.
MINIATURES. C. Davenport.
OUR LADY IN ART. Mrs. H. Jeanner.
RAPHAEL. A. E. Dryhurst. Second Edition.
REMBRANDT. Miss E. A. Sharp.
TURNER. F. Tyrell-Gill.
VAN DYCK. M. G. Smalwood.
VELASQUEZ. W. Wilberforce and A. R. Gilbert.
WATTS. R. E. D. Sketchley.

The Little Galleries

Demy 16mo. 2s. 6d. net.

Each volume contains 20 plates in Photogravure, together with a short outline of the life and work of the master to whom the book is devoted.

A LITTLE GALLERY OF REYNOLDS.
A LITTLE GALLERY OF ROMNEY.
A LITTLE GALLERY OF HOPNER.

A LITTLE GALLERY OF WILLIAMS.
A LITTLE GALLERY OF ENGLISH POETS.

The Little Guides

With many Illustrations by E. H. New and other artists, and from photographs.

Small Post 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net.; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

The main features of these Guides are (1) a handy and charming form; (2) illustrations from photographs and by well-known artists; (3) good plans and maps; (4) an adequate but compact presentation of everything that is interesting in the natural features, history, archaeology, and architecture of the town or district treated.

CAMBRIDGE AND ITS COLLEGES. A. H. Thompson. Second Edition.

ENGLISH LAKES, THE. F. G. Brabent.

ISLE OF WIGHT TOWNS. G. Clinch.

MALVERN COUNTRY, THE. B. C. A. Winstle.

NORTH WALES. A. T. Story.

OXFORD AND ITS COLLEGES. J. Wells. Eighth Edition.

SHAKESPEARE'S COUNTRY. B. C. A. Winstle. Third Edition.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL. G. Clinch.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY. C. E. Trewock. Second Edition.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE. E. S. Rosecr.

CHESHIRE. W. M. Callichs.

CORNWALL. A. L. Salmon.

DERBYSHIRE. J. C. Cox.

DEVON. S. Baring-Gould.

DORSET. T. R. Heath. Second Edition.

ESSEX. J. C. Cox.

HAMPSHIRE. J. C. Cox.

HARPTSFIELDING. H. W. Tompkins.

KENT. G. Clinch.

KENT. C. P. Crane.

MIDDLESEX. J. B. Firth.

MORNINGTHORPE. G. W. Wade and J. H. Wade.

NOFSOLE. W. A. Dutt.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE. W. Dry.

OXFORDSHIRE. F. G. Brabent.

SOMERSET. G. W. and J. H. Wade.

SUFFOLK. W. A. Dutt.

SURREY. F. A. H. Lambert.

SUSSEX. F. G. Brabent. Second Edition.

YORKSHIRE, THE EAST RIDING. J. E. Morris.

YORKSHIRE, THE NORTH RIDING. J. E. Morris.

BRETAGNE. S. Baring-Gould.

FRANCE. C. Scudamore.

RODEZ. C. G. Ellaby.

SICILY. F. M. Jackson.

The Little Library

With Introductions, Notes, and Photogravure Frontispieces.

Small Post 8vo. Each Volume, cloth, 1s. 6d. net.; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

Austin. A LITTLE BOOK OF ENGLISH LYRICS. Second Edition.

Austen (Jane). PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Edited by E. V. Lucas. Two Vols.

NORTHANGER ABBEY. Edited by E. V. Lucas.

Bacon (Francis). THE ESSAYS OF LORD BACON. Edited by EDWARD WRIGHT.

Barbey (R. H.). THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS. Edited by J. B. ATLAS. Two Volumes.

Barnett (Mrs. P. A.). A LITTLE BOOK OF ENGLISH PROSE. Second Edition.

Beckford (William). THE HISTORY OF THE CALIPH VATHEK. Edited by E. DENISON ROSE.

Blake (William). SELECTIONS FROM WILLIAM BLAKE. Edited by M. PERUGINI.

Borrow (George). LAVENGRO. Edited by F. HINDES GROOME. Two Volumes.

THE KUMANY RYE. Edited by JOHN SAMSON.

Browning (Robert). SELECTIONS FROM THE EARLY POEMS OF ROBERT BROWNING. Edited by W. HALL GRIFFIN, M.A.

Canning (George). SELECTIONS FROM THE ANTI-JACOBIN: with Canning's additional Poems. Edited by LLOYD SANDERS.

Cowley (Abraham). THE ESSAYS OF ABRAHAM COWLEY. Edited by H. C. McNeiv.

Crabbe (George). SELECTIONS FROM GEORGE CRABBE. Edited by A. C. Deane.

Crank (Mrs.). JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN. Edited by ANNE MATTHEWS. Two Volumes.

Crashaw (Richard). THE ENGLISH POEMS OF RICHARD CRASHAW. Edited by EDWARD HUTTON.

Dante (Alighieri). THE INFERO OF DANTE. Translated by H. F. CAREY. Edited by PAGEY TOYNBEE, M.A., D.Lit.

THE PURGATORIO OF DANTE. Translated by H. F. CAREY. Edited by PAGEY TOYNBEE, M.A., D.Lit.

THE PARADISO OF DANTE. Translated by H. F. CAREY. Edited by PAGEY TOYNBEE, M.A., D.Lit.

Darley (George). SELECTIONS FROM THE POEMS OF GEORGE DARLEY. Edited by R. A. STEATFIELD.

THE LITTLE LIBRARY—continued.

Dense (A. C.). A LITTLE BOOK OF LIGHT VERSE.

Dickens (Charles). CHRISTMAS BOOKS. Two Volumes.

Ferrier (Susan). MARRIAGE. Edited by A. GOODRICH FREER and LORE LOPEZ-LEON. Two Volumes.

THE INHERITANCE. Two Volumes.

Gaskell (Mrs.). CRANFORD. Edited by E. V. LUCAS. Second Edition.

Hawthorne (Nathaniel). THE SCARLET LETTER. Edited by Percy Dearmer.

Henderson (T. F.). A LITTLE BOOK OF SCOTTISH VERSE.

Kesta (John). POEMS. With an Introduction by L. BIXON, and Notes by J. MASEFIELD.

Kinglake (A. W.). EOTHEN. With an Introduction and Notes. Second Edition.

Lamb (Charles). ELIA AND THE LAST ESSAYS OF ELIA. Edited by E. V. LUCAS.

Locke (F.). LONDON LYRICS. Edited by A. D. GODLEY, M.A. A reprint of the First Edition.

Longfellow (H. W.). SELECTIONS FROM LONGFELLOW. Edited by L. M. FAITHFULL.

Marvell (Andrew). THE POEMS OF ANDREW MARVELL. Edited by E. WRIGHT.

Milton (John). THE MINOR POEMS OF JOHN MILTON. Edited by H. C. BECHING, M.A.

Moir D. M.). MANSIE WAUCH. Edited by T. F. HENDERSON.

Nicholas (J. B. B.). A LITTLE BOOK OF ENGLISH SONNETS.

Rochefoucauld (La). THE MAXIMS OF LA ROCHEFOUCAULD. Translated by Dean STANHOPE. Edited by G. H. ———.

Smith (Horace and James). REJECTED ADDRESSES. Edited by A. D. GODLEY, M.A.

Sterne (Laurence). A SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY. Edited by H. W. PAUL.

Tennyson (Alfred, Lord). THE EARLY POEMS OF ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by J. CHURTON COLLINS, M.A. IN A MEMORIAL. Edited by H. C. BECHING, M.A.

THE PRINCESS. Edited by ELIZABETH WORDSWORTH.

MAUD. Edited by ELIZABETH WORDSWORTH.

Thackeray (W. M.). VANITY FAIR. Edited by S. GWYNNE. Three Volumes.

PENDENNIS. Edited by S. GWYNNE. Three Volumes.

ESMOND. Edited by S. GWYNNE.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS. Edited by S. GWYNNE.

Vaughan (Henry). THE POEMS OF HENRY VAUGHAN. Edited by EDWARD HUTTON.

Walton (Isaac). THE COMPLEAT ANGLER. Edited by J. BUCHAN.

Waterhouse (Elizabeth). A LITTLE BOOK OF LIFE AND DEATH. Edited by. Twelfth Edition.

Wordsworth (W.). SELECTIONS FROM WORDSWORTH. Edited by NOWELL C. SMITH.

Wordsworth (W.) and Coleridge (S. T.). LYRICAL BALLADS. Edited by GEORGE SAMSON.

The Little Quarto Shakespeare

Edited by W. J. CRAIG. With Introductions and Notes.

Pott 16mo. In 40 Volumes. Leather, price 1s. net each volume.

Mahogany Revolving Book Case. 10s. net.

Miniature Library

Reprints in miniature of a few interesting books which have qualities of humanity, devotion, or literary genius.

EUPHRANOR: A Dialogue on Youth. By Edward FitzGerald. From the edition published by W. Pickering in 1851. Demy 32mo. Leather, 2s. net.

THE LIFE OF EDWARD, LORD HERSCHEL OR CHEESEBOX. Written by himself. From the edition printed at Strawberry Hill in the year 1764. Demy 32mo. Leather, 2s. net.

POLONIUS: or Wise Jaws and Modern Instances. By Edward FitzGerald. From the edition published by W. Pickering in 1852. Demy 32mo. Leather, 2s. net.

THE RUBÁÍYÁT OF OMAR KHAYYÁM. By Edward FitzGerald. From the 1st edition of 1859. Fourth Edition. Leather, 2s. net.

A New Historical Series

Edited by the Rev. H. N. ASMAN, M.A., B.D.

Studies from Ancient History. By E. Bower, B.A. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d. | Studies from Modern History. By E. M. Wilmot-Buxton, F.R.Hist.S. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

The New Library of Medicine

Edited by C. W. SALEEBY, M.D., F.R.S. Edm. Demy 8vo.

CARE OF THE BODY, THE. F. Gurnagh. Second Edition. 7s. 6d. net.	DRUGS AND THE DRUG HABIT. H. Sambury. FUNCTIONAL NERVOUS DISEASES. A. T. Schaeffer. 7s. 6d. net.
CHILDREN OF THE NATION, THE. Right Hon. Sir John Gorst. Second Ed. 7s. 6d. net.	HYPNOSIS OF MIND. THE. T. S. Clouston. Fifth Edition. 7s. 6d. net.
CONTROL OF A SCOURGE, THE; or, How Cancer Is Curable. THE. F. Childe. 7s. 6d. net.	INFANT MORTALITY. George Newman. 7s. 6d. net.
DISEASES OF OCCUPATION. Sir Thomas Oliver. Second Edition. 10s. 6d. net.	PREVENTION OF TUBERCULOSIS (CONSUMPTION). THE. Arthur Newsholme. 10s. 6d. net.
DRINK PROBLEM, THE, in its Medico-Sociological Aspects. Edited by T. N. Reynard. 7s. 6d. net.	AIR AND HEALTH. Ronald C. Macle, M.A., M.B. 7s. 6d. net. Second Edition.

The New Library of Music

Edited by ERNEST NEWMAN. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

HUGO WOLF. By Ernest Newman. With 13 Illustrations. | HANDEL. By R. A. Streatfeild. With 22 Illustrations. Second Edition.

Oxford BiographiesFrat. 8vo. Each volume, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.*

DANTE ALIGHIERI. By Paget Toynbee, M.A. D. Lit. With 12 Illustrations. Third Edition.	ROBERT BURNS. By T. F. Henderson. With 21 Illustrations.
GIROLAMO SARDAVACOLA. By E. L. S. Horsburgh, M.A. With 11 Illustrations. Fourth Edition.	CHATHAM. By A. S. McDowall. With 22 Illustrations.
JOHN HOWARD. By E. C. S. Gibson, D.D. Bishop of Gloucester. With 12 Illustrations.	FRANCIE OF ASSISI. By Anna M. Stockdale. With 16 Illustrations.
ALFRED TENNYSON. By A. C. Benson, M.A. With 91 Illustrations. Second Edition.	CANNING. By W. Alison Phillips. With 22 Illustrations.
SIR WALTER RALEIGH. By L. A. Taylor. With 12 Illustrations.	BEAUMESFIELD. By Walter Sickert. With 22 Illustrations.
ERASMUS. By E. F. H. Capsey. With 21 Illustrations.	JOHANN WOLFGANG GOETHE. By H. C. Alcina. With 16 Illustrations.
THE YOUNG PRETENDER. By C. S. Terry. With 12 Illustrations.	FRANÇOIS FENELON. By Viscount St Cyre. With 22 Illustrations.

Romantic HistoryEdited by MARTIN HUME, M.A. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo.

A series of attractive volumes in which the periods and personalities selected are such as afford romantic human interest, in addition to their historical importance.

THE FIRST GOVERNOR OF THE NETHERLANDS, MARGARET OF AUSTRIA. By Eleanor E. Tremayne. 10s. 6d. net.	MARTIN HUME, M.A. 1s. 6d. net.
TWO ENGLISH QUEENS AND PHILIP. By	THE NINE DAYS' QUEEN. By Richard Davey. With a Preface by Martin Hume, M.A. 10s. 6d. net.

School Examination Series

Edited by A. M. M. STEDMAN, M.A. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

EXAMINATION PAPERS IN ENGLISH HISTORY. By J. Tait Plowden-Wardlaw, B.A.	GREEK EXAMINATION PAPERS. By A. M. M. Stedman, M.A. Ninth Edition. KEY. Fourth Edition. 6s. net.
FRENCH EXAMINATION PAPERS. By A. M. M. Stedman, M.A. Fifteenth Edition. KEY. Sixth Edition. 6s. net.	HISTORY AND GEOGRAPHY EXAMINATION PAPERS. By C. H. Spence, M.A. Third Edition.
GENERAL KNOWLEDGE EXAMINATION PAPERS. By A. M. M. Stedman, M.A. Seventh Edition. KEY. Fourth Edition. 7s. net.	LATIN EXAMINATION PAPERS. By A. M. M. Stedman, M.A. Fourteenth Edition. KEY. Seventh Edition. 6s. net.
GERMAN EXAMINATION PAPERS. By R. J. Morich. Seventh Edition. KEY. Third Edition. 6s. net.	PHYSICS EXAMINATION PAPERS. By R. E. Steel, M.A., F.C.S.

School Histories

Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.

A SCHOOL HISTORY OF WARWICKSHIRE. By R. C. A. Windle, D.Sc., F.R.S.	A SCHOOL HISTORY OF SURREY. By H. E. Baldwin, M.A.
A SCHOOL HISTORY OF SOMERSET. By Walter Raymond. Second Edition.	A SCHOOL HISTORY OF MIDDLESEX. By V. G. Plass, M.A., and F. W. Walton, M.A.
A SCHOOL HISTORY OF LANCASHIRE. By W. E. Rhodes, M.A.

Simplified French Texts

Edited by T. R. N. CROFTS, M.A.

Fcap 8vo. 1s.

ASSEZ-ALLAI. By Edouard Laboulaye. Adapted by J. A. Wilson.	LE DOCTEUR MATTHIAS. By Eckermann-Chatrian. Adapted by W. P. Fuller, M.A.
DEUX CONTES. By P. Mérimée. Adapted by J. F. Rhoades.	M. DE BEAUFORT À VINCENNES. By A. Dumas. Adapted by P. B. Ingham, M.A.
EBMONT DANDEL. By A. Dumas. Adapted by M. Cessé.	L'ÉQUIPAGE DE LA BELLE-NIVELAISE. By Alphonse Daudet. Adapted by T. R. N. Crofts, M.A.
JEAN VALJEAN. By Victor Hugo. Adapted by F. W. M. Draper, M.A.	L'HISTOIRE D'UNE TUTE. By A. Dumas. Adapted by T. R. N. Crofts, M.A. Second Edition.
LA BATAILLE DE WATERLOO. By Eckermann-Chatrian. Adapted by G. H. Evans.	L'HISTOIRE DE PIERRE ET CAMILLE. By A. de Musset. Adapted by J. B. Patterson, M.A.
LA BOUILLIE AU MIEL. By A. Dumas. Adapted by P. B. Ingham, M.A.	MÉMOIRES DE CADICHON. By Bladimir de Séguir. Adapted by J. F. Rhoades.
LA CHANSON DE ROLAND. Adapted by H. Rieu, M.A. Second Edition.	D'AJACCIO À SAINT HELENE. By A. Dumas. Adapted by F. W. M. Draper, M.A.
Le CONSCRIT DE 1813. By Eckermann-Chatrian. Adapted by H. Rieu.	REMI LE CHEVREUIL. By E. Souvestre. Adapted by E. E. Chotila, B.A.L.

Simplified German Texts

Edited by T. R. G. CROFTS, M.A. Fcap. 8vo. 1s.

DER MÜLLER AM RHEIN. By C. Breasted. Adapted by Florence A. Ryan.	Die Notnacht. By W. H. Richl. Adapted by P. B. Ingham, M.A.
Die Geschichte von Peter Schlemihl. By A. v. Chamisso. Adapted by R. C. Perry.	UNDINE UND HULDRAUD. By La Motte Fouqué. Adapted by T. R. N. Crofts, M.A.

Six Ages of European History

Edited by A. H. JOHNSON, M.A. With Maps. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Age of the Enlightenment, 1700-1789. A. H. Johnson.
Central Period of the Middle Age, 950-1375. Beatrice A. Levi.
Days of Medieval Europe, 1375-1500. J. H. B. Maitland.

Era of the Modern Age, 1500-1815. E. C. Lodge.
Europe in Renaissance and Reformation, 1453-1650. M. A. Hollings.
Remaking of Modern Europe, 1789-1850. J. A. R. Martin. Second Edition.

Methuen's Standard Library

Cloth, 1s. net; double volumes, 1s. 6d. net. Paper, 6d. net; double volume, 1s. net.

The Misfortunes of Marcus Antonius. Translated by R. Graves.
Sense and Sensibility. Jane Austen.
Errors and Counsels and The New Atlantis. Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam.
Religio Medici and Van Helst. Sir Thomas Browne. The text collated by A. R. Waller.
The Pilgrim's Progress. John Bunyan.
Reflections on the French Revolution. Edmund Burke.
The Poems and Songs of Robert Burns. Double Volume.
The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed. Joseph Butler.
Miscellaneous Poems. T. Chatterton.
The Rowley Poem. T. Chatterton.
Tom Jones. Henry Fielding. Treble Vol.
Chapman. Mrs. Gaskell.
The Poems and Plays of Oliver Goldsmith.
The Case is Altered. Every Man in His Humour. Ben Jonson.
Cynthia's Revels. Pantastick. Ben Jonson.

The Poems of Percy Bysshe Shelley. In 4 volumes. With Introductions by C. D. Locock.
The Life of Nelson. Robert Southey.
The Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne. Gilbert White.

Textbooks of Science

Edited by G. F. GOODCHILD, M.A., B.Sc., and G. R. MILLS, M.A.

Fully Illustrated.

COMPLETE SCHOOL CHEMISTRY, 1s. By F. M. Oldham, B.A. With 160 Illustrations. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

ELEMENTARY SCIENCE FOR PUPIL TEACHERS. PHYSICAL SECTION. By W. T. Clough, A.R.C.Sc. (Lond.), F.C.S. CHEMISTRY SECTION. By A. E. Dunstan, B.Sc. (Lond.), F.C.S. With 2 Plates and 20 Diagrams. Cr. 8vo. 2s.

EXAMPLES IN ELEMENTARY MECHANICS, Practical, Graphical, and Theoretical. By W. J. Dobbs, M.A. With 32 Diagrams. Cr. 8vo. 3s.

EXAMPLES IN PHYSICS. By C. E. Jackson, M.A. Cr. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

FIRST YEAR PHYSICS. By C. E. Jackson, M.A. With 31 Diagrams. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

OUTLINES OF PHYSICAL CHEMISTRY. By George Searle, B.Sc. (Lond.), Ph.D. With many Diagrams. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

ORGANIC CHEMISTRY, 1s. FOR SCHOOLS AND TECHNICAL INSTITUTIONS. By A. E. Dunstan, B.Sc. (Lond.), F.C.S. With many Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

PLANT LIFE, STUDIES IN GARDEN AND SCHOOL. By Horace F. Jones, F.C.S. With 100 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

PRACTICAL CHEMISTRY, Part I. W. French, M.A. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

PRACTICAL CHEMISTRY, Part II. W. French, M.A., and T. H. Boardman, M.A. Cr. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

PRACTICAL CHEMISTRY FOR SCHOOLS AND TECHNICAL INSTITUTIONS, A. By A. E. Dunstan, B.Sc. (Sheffield and Lond.), F.C.S. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

PRACTICAL MECHANICS. S. H. Wells. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

TECHNICAL ARITHMETIC AND GEOMETRY. By C. T. Mills, M.I.M.E. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Textbooks of Technology

Fully Illustrated.

BUILDERS' QUANTITIES. By H. C. Grubb. Cr. 8vo. 4s. 6d.	HOW TO MAKE A DRESS. By J. A. E. Wood. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
CARPENTRY AND JOINERY. By F. C. Webber. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.	INSTRUCTION IN COOKERY. A. P. THOMSON. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
ELECTRIC LIGHT AND POWER: An Introduction to the Study of Electrical Engineering. By E. E. Brooks, B.Sc. (Lond.), and W. H. N. Jauncey, A.M.I.E.E., A.R.C.Sc. Cr. 8vo. 4s. 6d.	INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF TEXTILE DESIGN, AN. By Alfred E. Barker. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d.
ENGINEERING WORKSHOP PRACTICE. By C. C. Allen. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.	MILLINERY, THEORETICAL AND PRACTICAL. By Clara Hill. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 2s.
	RÉPOUSÉ METAL WORK. By A. C. North. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Handbooks of Theology

THE DOCTRINE OF THE INCARNATION. By R. L. OULNEY, D.D. Fourth Edition revised. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.	AN INTRODUCTION TO THE HISTORY OF THE GREEKS. By A. E. BURGESS, D.D. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.
A HISTORY OF EARLY CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE. By J. F. Bethune-Baker, M.A. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.	THE PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA. By Alfred Caldecott, D.D. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.
AN INTRODUCTION TO THE HISTORY OF RELIGION. By F. B. Jevons, M.A., LL.D. Fourth Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.	THE XXXIX ARTICLES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. Edited by E. C. S. Gibson, D.D. Sixth Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.

The Westminster Commentaries

General Editor, WALTER LOCK, D.D., Warden of Keble College, Dean Ireland's Professor of Exegesis in the University of Oxford.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. Edited by R. B. Rackham, M.A. Demy 8vo. Fourth Edition. 1s. 6d.	THE BOOK OF GENESIS. Edited with Introduction and Notes by S. R. Driver, D.D. Seventh Edition. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.
THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS. Edited by H. L. Gouges, M.A. Second Ed. Demy 8vo. 6s.	Also, to be obtained separately, Additions and Corrections in the Seventh Edition of the Book of Genesis. Demy 8vo. 1s.
A COMMENTARY ON EXODUS. By A. H. M'Neile, B.D. With a Map and 3 Plans. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.	THE BOOK OF JOB. Edited by E. C. S. Gibson, D.D. Second Edition. Demy 8vo. 6s.
THE BOOK OF EZEKIEL. Edited H. A. Redpath, M.A., D.Litt. Demy 8vo. 1s. 6d.	THE EPISTLE OF ST. JAMES. Edited with Introduction and Notes by R. J. Knowling, D.D. Demy 8vo. 6s.

PART II.—FICTION

Albanese (B. Maria). SUSANNAH AND ONE OTHER. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.	THE INVINCIBLE AMELIA: THE POLITE ADVENTURESS. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
THE BLUNDER OF AN INNOCENT. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.	Annesley (Maude). THIS DAY'S MADNESS. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
CAPRICIOUS CAROLINE. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.	Anstey (F.). A BAYARD FROM BENGAL. Medium 8vo. 6d.
LOVE AND LOUISA. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Medium 8vo. 6d.	Austen (Jane). PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Medium 8vo. 6d.
PETER, A PARASITE. Cr. 8vo. 6s.	Avellan (Francis). ARNOUL THE ENGLISHMAN. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE BROWN EYES OF MARY. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.	Bagot (Richard). A ROMAN MYSTERY. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Medium 8vo. 6d.
I KNOW A MAIDEN. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Medium 8vo. 6d.

Praedator (Mary). A NARROW WAY. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
OVER THE HILLS. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE ROSE OF JOY. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
A BLIND BIRD'S NEST. With 8 Illustrations. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Philpot (R.) THE WEANS AT RYWALLAN Illustrated. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 French (M. E.). (Mrs. Francis Blundell). STEPPING WESTWARD. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
MARGERY O' THE MILL. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
HARDY-ON-THE-HILL. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
GALATEA OF THE WHEATFIELD. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Fraser (Mrs. Hugh). THE SLAKING OF THE SWORD. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
IN THE SHADOW OF THE LORD. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
GIANNELLA. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Fry (D. and C. B.). A MOTHER'S SON. Fifth Edition. Cr. 16mo. 6s.
 Fuller-Maitland (Edna). BLANCHE EASTHEAD. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Galtier (Tom). RICKERRY'S FOLLY. Medium 8vo. 6s.
 Gaskell (Mrs.). CRANFORD. Medium 8vo. 6s.
MARY BARTON. Medium 8vo. 6s.
NORTH AND SOUTH. Medium 8vo. 6s.
 Gates (Eleanor). THE PLOW-WOMAN. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Gerard (Dorothée). HOLY MATTINITY. Medium 8vo. 6s.
MADE OF MONEY. Medium 8vo. 6s.
THE IMPROBABLE IDYL. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE BRIDGE OF LIFE. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE CONQUEST OF LONDON. Medium 8vo. 6s.
 Gibbs (Philip). THE SPIRIT OF REVOLT. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Glazebrook (George). THE TOWN TRAVELLER. Medium 8vo. 6s.
THE CROWN OF LIFE. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Also Medium 8vo. 6s.
 Glazebrook (Ernest). THE INCA'S TREASURE. Illustrated. Cr. 8vo. 12s. 6d.
 Also Medium 8vo. 6s.
THE KLOOF BRIDE. Medium 8vo. 6s.
 Glazebrook (Charles). BUNTER'S CRUISE. Illustrated. Cr. 8vo. 12s. 6d.
 Also Medium 8vo. 6s.
 Orton (The Brothers). CRIMMISFAIRY TALES. Illustrated. Medium 8vo. 6s.
HOLY J. C. IN THE GRIP OF THE TRUSTEE: A STORY OF 1914. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 12s.
 Hamilton (M.). THE FIRST CLAIM. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Hartmann (Beatrice). IN VARYING MOODS. Fourteenth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE SCHOLAR'S DAUGHTER. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
HILDA STRAFFORD and THE REMITTANCE MAN. Twelfth Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
INTERPLAY. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Harrod (F.) (Frances Forbes Robertson). THE TAMING OF THE BRUTE. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Hart (Mabel). SISTER R. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Dickens (Robert). THE PROPHET OF BERKELEY SQUARE. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
TONGUES OF CONSCIENCE. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
FIFI. Sixth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE WOMAN WITH THE TAX. Seventh Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
EYEWAYS. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE GARDEN OF ALLAH. Eighth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE BLACK SPANIEL. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE CALL OF THE BLOOD. Seventh Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
BARBARY SHEEP. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
 Hope (Anthony). THE GOD IN THE CAR. Eleventh Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
A CHANCE OF AIR. Sixth Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Also Medium 8vo. 6s.
A MAN OF MARE. Sixth Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Also Medium 8vo. 6s.
THE CHRONICLES OF COUNT AM. TONIO. Sixth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Also Medium 8vo. 6s.
 Phraso. Illustrated by H. R. Millar. Eighth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Also Medium 8vo. 6s.
 Simon Dale. Illustrated. Eighth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE KING'S MIRROR. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Quisanté. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE DOLLY DIALOGUES. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Also Medium 8vo. 6s.
A SERVANT OF THE PUBLIC. Illustrated. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
TALES OF TWO PEOPLE. With a Foreword by A. H. BUCKLAND. Third Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE GREAT MISJ DRIVER. With a Foreword by A. H. BUCKLAND. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Hornung (E. W.). DEAD MEN TELL NO TALES. Medium. 6d.

Homer (Chambers). THE LIFE OF SIR AGLOVAL DE GALIS. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Homer (Ford Madox). AN ENGLISH GIRL: A ROMANCE. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

MR. APOLLO: A JEST PROBLEM STORY. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Hutton (Bertram von). THE MALO. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Hyne (C. J. Cutcliffe). MR. MORROCKS, PURSER. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

PRINCE RUPERT, THE BUCCANEER. Illustrated. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Ingraham (J. H.). THE THRONE OF DAVID. Medium. 6s.

Jacobs (W. W.). MANY CARGOES. Thirty-fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

SEA URCHINS. Fifteenth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

A MASTER OF CRAFT. Illustrated by Will Owen. Ninth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

LIGHT FREIGHTS. Illustrated by Will Owen and Others. Eighth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

THE SKIFFER'S WOOING. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

AT SUNWICH PORT. Illustrated by Will Owen. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

DIALSTONE LANE. Illustrated by Will Owen. Seventh Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

ODD CRAFT. Illustrated by Will Owen. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

THE LADY OF THE BARGE. Illustrated. Eighth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

SALTHAVEN. Illustrated by Will Owen. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

SAILOUT KNOTS. Illustrated by Will Owen. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

James (Henry). THE SOFT SIDE. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE BETTER SORT. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE GOLDEN BOWL. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Kate (H. A. Macbeth). HE THAT EATETH BREAD WITH ME. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Keeper (Vaughan). THE FORTUNES OF THE LANDRAYS. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Lawless (Mrs. Emily). WITH ESSEX IN IRELAND. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Le Queux (William). THE HUNCHBACK OF WESTMINSTER. Third Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Medium. 6s.

THE CLOSED BOOK. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE VALLEY OF THE SHADOW. Illustrated. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

BEHIND THE THRONE. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE CROOKED WAY. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Levett-Yates (B. K.). ORRAK. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Medium. 6s.

THE TRAITOR'S WAY. Medium. 6s.

Lister (E. Lyne). THE TRUE HISTORY OF JOSHUA DAVIDSON. Medium. 6s.

London (Jack). WHITE FANG. With a Frontispiece by CHARLES RIVINGTON BULL. Seventh Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Lubbock (Beauchamp). DEEP SEA WANDERS. With 4 Illustrations. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Lumsden (St. John). THE FIRST ROUND. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Lynn (Edmund). DERRICK VAUGHAN, NOVELIST. With Thirteen. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. Also Medium. 6s.

Martens (Maerten). THE NEW RELIGION: A MODERN NOVEL. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE PRICE OF LIS DORIS. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

BROTHERS ALL; MORE STORIES OF DUTCH PEASANT LIFE. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

McCarthy (Justin H.). THE LADY OF LOYALTY HOUSE. Illustrated. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE DRYAD. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE DUKE'S MOTTO. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Macdonald (Ronald). A HUMAN TRINITY. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Macneughan (E.). THE FORTUNE OF CHRISTINA McNAUL. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Malot (Léon). COLONEL ENDERBY'S WIFE. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

A COUNSEL OF PERFECTION. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Also Medium. 6s.

THE WAGES OF SIN. Fourteenth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE CARISSIMA. Fifth Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Also Medium. 6s.

THE GATELESS BARRIER. Four Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE HISTORY OF SIR RICHARD CALMADY. Seventh Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Mason (Mrs. M. H.). OLIVIA'S SUMMER. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

A LOST ESTATE. A New Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Also Medium. 6s.

THE PARISH OF HILBY. A New Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE PARISH NURSE. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

GRANMA'S JANE. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

MRS. PETER HOWARD. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Medium 8vo. 6d.
A WINTER'S TALE. A New Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Medium 8vo. 6d.
ONE ANOTHER'S BURDENS. A New Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Also Medium 8vo. 6d.
ROSE AT HONEYHOT. Third Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THERE WAS ONCE A PRINCE. Illustrated by M. B. MANN. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
WHEN ARNOLD COMES HOME. Illustrated by M. B. MANN. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
THE ECLASIORE PORTRAITS. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE MEMORIES OF RONALD LOVE. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE SHEEP AND THE GOAT. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
A SHEAF OF CORN. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE HEART-SMITER. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
AVENGING CHILDREN. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE PATTEN EXPERIMENT. Medium 8vo. 6d.
THE CEDAR STAR. Medium 8vo. 6d.
 Marchmont (A. W.), MISER ROAD-LEYSSECRET. Medium 8vo. 6d.
A MOMENT'S ERROR. Medium 8vo. 6d.
 Marlett (Charles), GENVRA. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Marryat (Captain), PETER SIMPLE
Died in 1848. 3s.
JACOB FAITHFUL. Medium 8vo. 6d.
 Marsh (Richard), THE TWICKENHAM PEERAGE. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Also Medium 8vo. 6d.
THE MARQUIS OF PUTNEY. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
IN THE SERVICE OF LOVE. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE GIRL AND THE MIRACLE. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE COWARD BEHIND THE CURTAIN. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE SURPRISING HUSBAND. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
A ROYAL INDISCRETION. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
A METAMORPHOSIS. Medium 8vo. 6d.
THE GODDESS. Medium 8vo. 6d.
THE JOSS. Medium 8vo. 6d.
 Marshall (Archibald), MANY JUNES. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE SQUIRE'S DAUGHTER. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Mason (A. E. W.), CLEMENTINA. Illustrated. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Also Medium 8vo. 6d.
 Matthews (Helen), HONEY. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Medium 8vo. 6d.

DRIFT OF GRIFFITHSCOURT. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Also Medium 8vo. 6d.
THE FERRYMAN. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
TALLY-HO! Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
SAM'S SWEETHEART. Medium 8vo. 6d.
Maud (Constance), A DAUGHTER OF FRANCE. With a Frontispiece. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Maxwell (W. B.), VIVIEN. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE RAGGED MESSENGER. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
FABULOUS FANCIES. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE GUARDED FLAME. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
ODD LENGTHS. Second Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
HILL RISE. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE COUNTESS OF MAYBURY. Between You and I. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Meads (L. T.), DRIFT. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Medium 8vo. 6d.
RESURGAM. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 VICTORY. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
A GIRL OF THE PEOPLE. Illustrated. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
HEPSY GIPSY. Illustrated. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
THE HONOURABLE MISS: A STORY OF AN OLD-FASHIONED TOWN. Illustrated. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
 Melton (R.), CESAR'S WIFE. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Meredith (George), HEART OF MY HEART. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Miller (Matthew), LIVING LIES. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Also Medium 8vo. 6d.
 Millford (Bertram), THE SIGN OF THE SPIDER. Illustrated. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. Also Medium 8vo. 6d.
IN THE WHIRL OF THE RISING. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE RED DERELICT. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Molesworth (Mrs.), THE REDGRANGE. Illustrated. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
MONTGOMERY (K. L.), COLONEL KATE. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Montrose (F. F.), THE ALIEN. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
 Also Medium 8vo. 6d.
 Morrison (Arthur), TALES OF MEAN STREETS. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
A CHILD OF THE JACK. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
THE HOLE IN THE WALL. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Medium 8vo. 6d.

TO LONDON TOWN. Second Ed. Cr. 6s.
Also 6s.

DIVERS VANITIES. Cr. 6s. 6d.

MARY BL (Mrs. H. Ward). THE RED HOUSE. Illustrated. Fourth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d. Also Medium 6s. 6d.

Noble (Edward). LORDS OF THESE SEA. Third Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Morris (W. E.). HARRY AND URSULA. A Story with two Sides to it. Second Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

HIS GRACE. Medium 6s. 6d.

GILES INGILBY. Medium 6s. 6d.

THE CREDIT OF THE COUNTY. Medium 6s. 6d.

LORD LEONARD THE LUCILESS. Medium 6s. 6d.

MATTHEW AUSTIN. Medium 6s. 6d.

CLARISA FURIOUS. Medium 6s. 6d.

Olkham (Mrs.). THE LADY'S WALK. Medium 6s. 6d.

SIR ROBERT'S FORTUNE. Medium 6s. 6d.

THE PRODIGALS. Medium 6s. 6d.

THE TWO MARYS. Medium 6s. 6d.

Olkham (Alfred). OWD BOB, THE GREY DOG OF KENMUIR. With a Frontispiece. Seventh Ed. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Opposition (E. Phillips). MASTER OF M.L.N. Fourth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.
Also Medium 6s. 6d.

Ornithion (John). A WEAVER OF WEBS. With 1 Illustration by MADRICK GRIFFITHS. Fourth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE GATE OF THE DESERT. With a Frontispiece in Photography by HAROLD CORNELL. Fifth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

PROFIT AND LOSS. With a Frontispiece in photography by HAROLD CORNELL. Sixth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE LONG ROAD. With a Frontispiece in Photography by HAROLD CORNELL. Fourth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE SONG OF HYACINTH, AND OTHER STORIES. Second Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

MY LADY OF SHADOWS. Fourth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Dale (Harry). LINDLEY KAYE. Third Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Parker (Gilbert). PIERRE AND HIS PEOPLE. Sixth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

MRS. FALCONER. Fifth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE TRANSLATION OF A SAVAGE. Third Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE TRAIL OF THE SWORD. Illustrated. Fourth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.
Also Medium 6s. 6d.

WHEN VALMOND CAME TO PONTIAC: The Story of a Long Neglect. Sixth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.
Also Medium 6s. 6d.

AN ADVENTURER OF THE NORTH. The Last Adventures of "Pretty Flirt." Fourth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE SEAS OF THE NIGHET. Illustrated. Sixteenth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE BATTLE OF THE STRONG: a Romance of Two Kingdoms. Illustrated. Sixth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE POMP OF THE LAVILlettes. Third Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

NORTHERN LIGHTS. Second Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Pastore (Vic. Henry). do 1s. THE TYRANT. Second Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Parkinson (J. F.). WATCHERS BY THE SHORE. Third Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Pemberton (Mary). THE FOOTSTEPS OF A THRONE. Illustrated. Third Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.
Also Medium 6s. 6d.

I CROWN THEE KING. With Illustrations by Frank Dodd and A. Verrier. Cr. 6s. 6d.

LOVE THE HALVESTER: A Story of the Skies. Illustrated. Third Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Philippine (Féodal). LIVING PROPHETS. Third Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

CHILDREN OF THE MIST. do 1s.
Also Medium 6s. 6d.

THE HUMAN BOY. With a Frontispiece. Seventh Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.
Also Medium 6s. 6d.

BONDS OF THE MORNING. Second Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE RIVER. Third Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.
Also Medium 6s. 6d.

THE AMERICAN PRISONER. Fourth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE SECRET WOMAN. Fourth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

KNOCK AT A VENTURE. With a Frontispiece. Third Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE FORTREEVE. Fourth Ed. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE POACHER'S WIFE. Second Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d. Also Medium 6s. 6d.

THE STRIKING HOURS. Second Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE FOLK AFIELD. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Pickford (Marguerite). SAID THE FISHERMAN. Second Ed. Cr. 6s. 6d.

BRENDLE. Second Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE HOUSE OF ISLAM. Third Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

'O' (A. T. Quiller-Couch). THE WHITE WOLF. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Also Medium 8vo. 6d.

THE MAYOR OF TROY. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

MERRILY-GARDEN, and other Stories. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

MAJOR VIGOUREUX. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Querré (Jules). TOIL OF MEN. Translated by F. S. Amherst. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Rawson (Maud Stephen). THE ENCHANTED GARDEN. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE EASY GO LUCKIES: or, ONE WAY OF LIVING. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

HAPPINESS. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Rhys (Oscar). THE WOOING OF SHEILA. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE BRIDE. Second Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Ridge (W. Peth). LOST PROPERTY. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Also Medium 8vo. 6d.

ERB. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Also Medium 8vo. 6d.

A SON OF THE STATE. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. Also Medium 8vo. 6d.

A BREAKER OF LAWS. A New Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

MRS. GALER'S BUSINESS. Illustrated. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE WICKHAMSEE. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

NAME OF GARLAND. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

SPLENDID BROTHER. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

GEORGE and THE GENERAL. Medium 8vo. 6d.

RHekle (Mrs. David G.). MAN AND THE CASSOCK. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Roberts (C. G. D.). THE HEART OF THE ANCIENT WOOD. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Robins (Elizabeth). THE CONVERT. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Rosenkrantz (Baron Pál). THE MAGISTRATE'S OWN CASE. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Russell (W. Clark). MY DANISH SWEETHEART. Illustrated. Fifth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Also Medium 8vo. 6d.

MIS ISLAND PRINCESS. Illustrated. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Also Medium 8vo. 6d.

ABANDONED. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.
Also Medium 8vo. 6d.

MASTER ROCKEFELLAR'S VOYAGE. Illustrated by Gordon Brown. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

A MARRIAGE AT SEA. Medium 8vo. 6s.

Ryan (Marie Ebb). FOR THE SOUL OF RAFAEL. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Sandys (Sydney). JACK CARSTAIRS OF THE POWER HOUSE. With 4 Illustrations by Stanley L. Wood. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Sartorius (Adelbert). THE PASSION OF PAUL MARILLIER. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE QUEST OF GEOFFREY DARRELL. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE COMING OF THE RANDOLPHS. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE PROGRESS OF RACHAEL. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

BARBARA'S MONEY. Medium 8vo. 6s.

THE MASTER OF BECHWOOD. Medium 8vo. 6d.

THE YELLOW DIAMOND. Second Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s. Also Medium 8vo. 6d.

THE LOVE THAT OVERCAME. Medium 8vo. 6d.

Shelley (Booth). ENDERBY. Third Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Slaterwick (Mrs. Alfred). THE KISS-MAN. With 3 Illustrations by C. E. Brock. Third Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE SEVERINS. Fourth Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Smith (Dorothy V. Herring). MISS MONA. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Somelsham (Albert). DEEP-SEA VACATIONS. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Stewart (Newton V.). A SON OF THE EMPEROR: Being Passages from the Life of ERIZO, King of Sardinia and Corsica. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Seabury (George). THE HAPPIEST MILLIONAIRE. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Burton (R. E.). HANDLEY CROSS. Illustrated. Medium 8vo. 6d.

MR. SPONGE'S SPORTING TOUR. Illustrated. Medium 8vo. 6d.

ASK MAMMA. Illus. Medium 8vo. 6s.

Swayne (Martin Lutrell). THE BISHOP AND THE LADY. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Thurston (E. Temple). MIRAGE. Fourth Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Underhill (Evalyn). THE COLUMN OF DUST. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Urquhart (H.). A TRAGEDY IN COMMONPLACE. Second Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Vest (Marie Vass). THE SENTIMENTAL ADVENTURES OF JIMMY BUL-STRODE. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

IN AMBUSH. Second Ed. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Walensky (Paul). THE DAY OF LILACS: A Romance from Finland. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

THE SONG OF THE FOREST. Cr. 8vo. 6s.

Walterd (Mrs. L. D.), MR. SMITH: A PASSIONATE PILGRIM. Medium
Edition. 6s. 6d.

THE BABY'S GRANDMOTHER. Medium
Edition. 6s. 6d.

COUSINS. Medium 6s. 6d.

TROUBLESOME DAUGHTERS. Medium
Edition. 6s. 6d.

Wallace (General Lew). BEN-HUR.
Medium 6s. 6d.

THE FAIR GOD. Medium 6s. 6d.

Waltz (Elizabeth C.). THE ANCIENT LANDMARK: A Kentucky Romance.
Cr. 6s. 6d.

Watson (H. B. Marriott). TWISTED
EGLANTINE Illustrated. Third Edition.
Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE HIGH TOBY. Being further Chapters in the Life and Adventures of Dick Ryder, otherwise Galloping Dick. With a Frontipiece. Third Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

A MIDSUMMER DAY'S DREAM.
Third Edition. Crown 6s. 6d.

THE PRIVATEERS. Illustrated. Second
Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

A POPPY SHOW: Being Divers AND Diverse TALES. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE FLOWER OF THE HEART. Third
Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE CASTLE BY THE SEA. Third
Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE ADVENTURERS. Medium 6s. 6d.

Webbing (Peggy). THE STORY OF VIRGINIA PERFECT. Third Edition.
Cr. 6s. 6d.

Weekes (A. S.). THE PRISONERS OF WAR. Medium 6s. 6d.

Wells (H. G.). THE SEA LADY. Cr.
6s. 6d. Also Medium 6s. 6d.

Weyman (Stanley). UNDER THE RED
ROBE. With Illustrations by R. C. Wood-
VILLE. Twenty-Second Ed. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Whitby (Beatrice). THE RESULT OF AN ACCIDENT. Second Edition. Cr.
6s. 6d.

White (Percy). THE SYSTEM. Third
Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

LOVE AND THE WISE MEN. Third
Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Williams (Margery). THE BAR. Cr.
6s. 6d.

Williamson (Mrs. C. N.). THE AD-VENTURE OF PRINCESS SYLVIA.
Second Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE WOMAN WHO DARED. Cr. 6s.
6d.

THE SEA COULD TELL. Second Edition.
Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE CASTLE OF THE SHADOWS.
Third Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

PAPA. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Williamson (C. N. and A. M.). THE LIGHTNING CONDUCTOR: The Strange Adventures of a Motor Car. With 16 Illustrations. Seventeenth Edition. Cr.
6s. 6d. Also Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE PRINCESS PASSES: A Romance of a Motor. With 16 Illustrations. Ninth
Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

MY FRIEND THE CHAUFFEUR. With 16 Illustrations. Tenth Edit. Cr. 6s. 6d.

LADY BETTY ACROSS THE WATER.
Tenth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE CAR OF DESTINY AND ITS ERRAND IN SPAIN. With 17 Illustrations. Fourth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

THE MOTOR CHAPERON. With a Frontipiece in Colour by A. H. BUCKLAND, 16 other Illustrations, and a Map. Fifth Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

SCARLET RUNNER. With a Frontispiece in Colour by A. H. BUCKLAND, and 8 other Illustrations. Third Ed. Cr. 6s. 6d.

SET IN SILVER. With a Frontispiece.
Second Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Wyllards (Doll). THE PATHWAY OF
THE PIONEER (Non Fiction). Fourth
Edition. Cr. 6s. 6d.

Yaldham (C. G.). DURHAM'S FARM.
Cr. 6s. 6d.

Books for Boys and Girls

Illustrated. Crown 6s. 6d.

THE GETTING WELL OF DOBOTH. By Mrs.
W. K. Clifford. Second Edition.

ONLY A GUARD-ROOM DOG. By Edith E.
Cuthell.

MASTER ROCKAFELLAR'S VOYAGE. By W.
Clark Russell. Fourth Edition.

SID BELTON: Or, the Boy who would not go to Sea. By G. Manville Fenn. Second Ed.

THE RED ORANGE. By Mrs. Molesworth.
A GIRL OF THE PROVINCE. By L. T. Meade.
Fourth Edition.

HEFTY GIFTY. By L. T. Meade. 6s. 6d.

THE HONOURABLE Miss. By L. T. Meade.
Second Edition.

THERE WAS ONCE A PRINCE. By Mrs. M. E.
Mann.

WHEN ARNOLD COMES HOME. By Mrs. M. E.
Mann.

The Novels of Alexandre Dumas
Medium 8vo. Price 6d. Double Volumes, 1s.

Arté.
 THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN FAMVILLE.
 ANACRY.
 THE BIRD OF PARADISE.
 THE BLACK TULIP.
 THE CASTLE OF ESPERON.
 CATHERINE BLUM.
 CECILE.
 THE CHEVALIER D'HARMENTAL. (Double volume.) 1s.
 CHICOT THE JESTER.
 CONSCIENCE.
 THE CONVICT'S SON.
 THE CORSICAN BROTHERS; and OTHER TALES.
 CROF-EARED JACQUOT.
 DOM GORENFLOT.
 THE FATAL COMBAT.
 THE FENCING MASTER.
 FERNANDE.
 GABRIEL LAMBERT.
 GEORGES.
 THE GREAT MASSACRE.
 HENRI DE NAVARRE.

HÉLÈNE DE CHAVERET.
 THE HOROSCOPE.
 LOUISE DE LA VAILLANCE. (Double volume.)
 1s.
 THE MAN IN THE IRON MASK. (Double volume.) 1s.
 MÂTRE ADAM.
 THE MOUTH OF HELL.
 NATION. (Double volume.) 1s.
 PAULINE; PASCAL BRUNO; and BOXTENDER.
 PÈRE LA RUINE.
 THE PRINCE OF THIEVES.
 THE REMINISCENCES OF ANTHONY.
 ROBIN HOOD.
 THE SNOWBALL AND SULTANETTA.
 SYLVANDIER.
 TALES OF THE SUPERNATURAL.
 TALES OF STRANGE ADVENTURE.
 THE THREE MUSKETEERS. (Double volume.)
 1s.
 THE TRAGEDY OF NANTES.
 TWENTY YEARS AFTER. (Double volume.) 1s.
 THE WILD-DUCK SHOOTER.
 THE WOLF-LEADER.

Methuen's Sixpenny Books

Medium 8vo.

Albaneil (E. Maria). LOVE AND LOUISA.
 I KNOW A MAIDEN.
 Anstey (F.). A BAVARD OF BENGAL.
 Austen (J.). PRIDE AND PREJUDICE.
 Bagot (Richard). A ROMAN MYSTERY.
 CASTING OF NETS.
 DONNA DIANA.
 Ballou (Andrew). BY STROKE OF SWORD.
 Baring-Gould (S.). FURZE BLOOM.
 CHEAP JACK ZITA.
 KITTY ALONE.
 URITH.
 THE BROOM SQUIRE.
 IN THE ROAR OF THE SEA.
 NOËMI.
 A BOOK OF FAIRY TALES. Illustrated.
 LITTLE TUPENNY.
 WINEFRED.
 THE FROBISHERS.
 THE QUEEN OF LOVE.
 ARMINELL.
 Barr (Robert). JENNIE BAXTER.
 IN THE MIDST OF ALARMS.
 THE COUNTESS TEKLA.
 THE MUTABLE MANY.
 Beacons (E. P.). DODO.
 THE VINTAGE.
 Greaté (Charlotte). SHIRLEY.

Brownell (C. L.). THE HEART OF JAPAN.
 Barton (J. Blaundelle). ACROSS THE SALT SEAS.
 Coffyn (Mrs.). ANNE MAULEVERER.
 Capes (Bernard). THE LAKE OF WINE.
 Clifford (Mrs. W. K.). A FLASH OF SUMMER.
 MRS. KEITH'S CRIME.
 Corbett (Jalland). A BUSINESS IN GREAT WATERS.
 Croker (Mrs. B. M.). ANGEL.
 A STATE SECRET.
 PEGGY OF THE BARTONS.
 JOHANNA.
 Dante (Alighieri). THE DIVINE COMEDY (Cary).
 Doyle (A. Conan). ROUND THE RED LAMP.
 Duncan (Sam Jeannette). A VOYAGE OF CONSOLATION.
 THOSE DELIGHTFUL AMERICANS.
 Elliot (George). THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.
 Findlater (Jane H.). THE GREEN GRAVES OF BALGOWRIE.
 Gallon (Tom). RICKERBY'S FOLLY.
 Gaskell (Mrs.). CRANFORD.
 MARY BARTON.
 NORTH AND SOUTH.

Oscar (Dorothy). HOLY MATRIMONY.
THE CONQUEST OF LONDON.
MADE OF MONEY.

Gissing (G). THE TOWN TRAVELLER.
THE CROWN OF LIFE.

Quayville (Ernest). THE INCA'S TREASURE.
THE KLOOF BRIDE.

Oleig (Charles). BUNTER'S CRUISE.

Orriss (The Brothers). CRIMES FAIRY TALES.

Hope (Anthony). A MAN OF MARK.
A CHANGE OF AIR.
THE CHRONICLES OF COUNT ANTONIO.

Piroso.
THE DOLLY DIALOGUES.

Morning (E. W.). DEAD MEN TELL NO TALES.

Ingraham (J. H.). THE THRONE OF DAVID.

La Queur (W.). THE HUNCHBACK OF WESTMINSTER.

Levett-Yeats (S. K.). THE TRAITOR'S WAY.
ORRAIN.

Linton (E. Lynn). THE TRUE HIS-TORY OF JOSHUA DAVIDSON.

Lynn (Edna). DERRICK VAUGHAN.

Malet (Lucas). THE CARISSINA.
A COUNSELL OF PERFECTION.

Maud (Mrs. M. E.). MRS. PETER HOWARD.
A LOST ESTATE.
THE CEDAR STAR.
ONE ANOTHER'S BURDENS.
THE PATTEN EXPERIMENT.
A WINTER'S TALE.

Marchmont (A. W.). MISER HOAD-LEY'S SECRET.
A MOMENT'S ERROR.

Marryat (Captain). PETER SIMPLE.
JACOB FAITHFUL.

Marsh (Richard). A METAMORPHOSIS.
THE TWICKENHAM PEERAGE.
THE GODDESS.
THE JOSS.

Mason (A. H. W.). CLEMENTINA.

Mather (Helen). HONEY.
GRIFF OF GRIFFITHSCOURT.
SAM'S SWEETHEART.

Meads (Mrs. L. T.). DRIFT.

Miller (Esther). LIVING LIES.

Mitford (Bertram). THE SIGN OF THE SPIDER.

Montresor (F. F.). THE ALIEN.

Morrison (Arthur). THE HOLE IN THE WALL.

Noble (E.) THE RED HOUSE.

Norris (W. H.). HIS GRACE.
GILES INGILBY.
THE CREDIT OF THE COUNTY.
LORD LEONARD THE LUCKLESS.
MATTHEW AUSTIN.
CLARISSA FURIOSA.

O'BRIEN (Mrs.). THE LADY'S WALK.
SIR ROBERT'S FORTUNE.
THE PRODIGALS.
THE TWO MARYS.

Oppenheim (H. P.). MASTER OF MEN.

Parker (Gilbert). THE POMP OF THE LAVILLETTES.
WHEN VALMOND CAME TO PONTIAC.
THE TRAIL OF THE SWORD.

Pemberton (Mark). THE FOOTSTEPS OF A THRONE.
I CROWN THEE KING.

Phillipps (Eden). THE HUMAN BOY.
CHILDREN OF THE LIST.
THE POACHER'S WIFE.
THE R VER.

'Q' (A. T. Quiller-Couch). THE WHITE WOLF.

Ridge (W. Perc). A SON OF THE STATE.
LOST PROPERTY.
GEORGE and THE GENERAL.

Russell (W. Clark). ABANDONED.
A MARRIAGE AT SEA.
MY DANISH SWEETHEART.
HIS ISLAND PRINCESS.

Sergeant (Adeline). THE MASTER OF BEECHWOOD.
BARBARA'S MONEY.
THE YELLOW DIAMOND.
THE LOVE THAT OVERCAME.

Slingsby (Mrs. Ahmed). THE KING-MAN.

Surtees (R. S.). HANDLEY CROSS.
MR. SPONGE'S SPORTING TOUR.
ASK MAMMA.

Watford (Mrs. L. B.). MR. SMITH.
COUSINS.
THE BABY'S GRANDMOTHER.
TROUBLESONE DAUGHTERS.

Wallace (General Low). BEN-HUR.
THE FAIR GOD.

Watson (H. B. Marriott). THE ADVENTURERS.

Weekes (A. B.). PRISONERS OF WAR.

Wells (H. Q.). THE SEA LADY.

White (Percy). A PASSIONATE PILGRIM.

2475 027

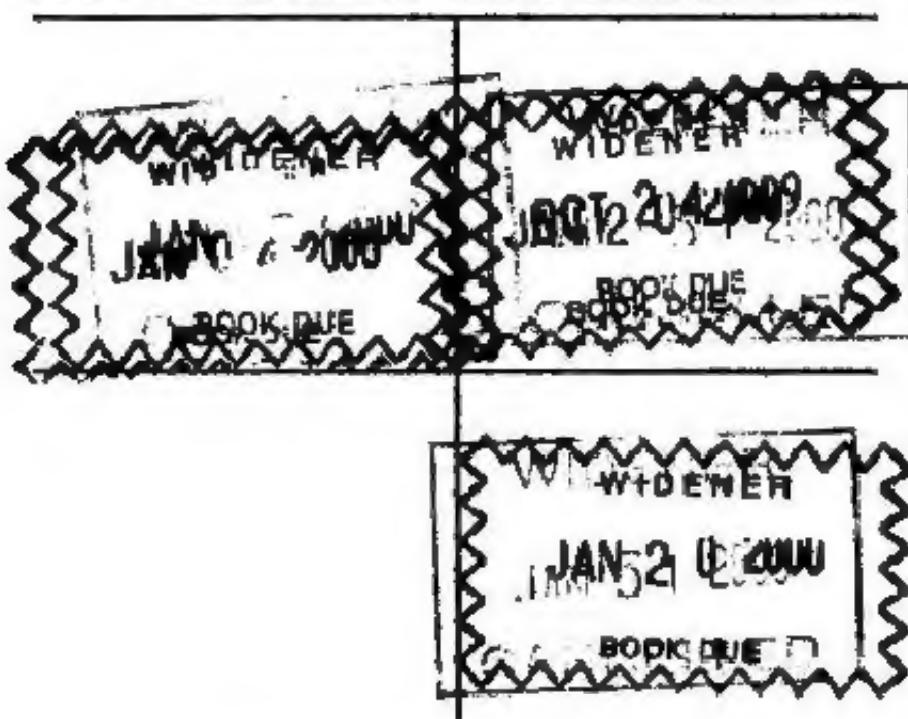

3 2044 018 177 493

The borrower must return this item on or before the last date stamped below. If another user places a recall for this item, the borrower will be notified of the need for an earlier return.

Non-receipt of overdue notices does not exempt the borrower from overdue fines.

Harvard College Widener Library
Cambridge, MA 02138 617-495-2413

Please handle with care.
Thank you for helping to preserve library collections at Harvard.

~~~~~

